“BOOKS ON AGRICULTURE (AL-FILĀḤA) PERTAINING TO MEDICAL SCIENCE” AND OTTOMAN AGRICULTURAL SCIENCE AND PRACTICE AROUND 1500

The inventory of the royal library of Sultan Bayezid II (r. 1481–1512), compiled in 908 (1502/3), has nine entries on “agriculture.” Rather than the more accepted term filāḥa, the inventory renders agriculture as falāḥa, and categorizes books on the subject under the heading “pertaining to” (min qibali) “medicine” (ṭibb).¹ This section on medicine, which is twenty-one pages long, includes 340 entries, some consisting of multiple volumes and compendiums.² Books on agriculture are listed on the final page. Only one of these books, the Kitāb Qaṣṭawīs (Book of Qastawīs), is given a specific title, while the rest are listed with generic names: Kitāb al-Falāḥa (Book on Agriculture), or Mukhtaṣar Kitāb al-Falāḥa (Abbreviated Book on Agriculture).

Here, I will try to identify the books on agriculture in the inventory through a study of available manuscripts in the Topkapı Palace Museum Library and in the Süleymaniye Library that bear the almond-shaped seal of Bayezid II.³ I will demonstrate that the library’s holdings on agriculture were dominated by the two earliest known Arabic works on agriculture. The first work, sometimes translated in Arabic as the Kitāb al-Zarʿ (Book on Planting) but more commonly known as the “Book of Qastus” or the Al-Filāḥa al-Rūmīya (Roman Agriculture), was originally written in Greek by the sixth-century author Cassianus Bassus Scholasticus (Qaṣṭūs b. Iskūlastika). Though the original Greek version is lost, there are two extant Arabic translations, the earliest dating to the ninth century.⁴ The second major work on agriculture is Al-Filāḥa al-Nabaṭīya (Nabataean Agriculture), which was based on earlier Syriac sources and translated in 291 (903/4) by Abu Bakr Ahmad ibn Ali ibn Qays al-Kasdani, also known as Ibn Wahshiyya, a scholar from Iraq.⁵

That these two works were or would soon be considered canonical for Ottoman scholars is shown by the fact that they are by far the most cited works in the Revnaḳ-ı Būstān (Splendor of the Garden), the earliest and most influential book on agriculture written in Ottoman Turkish. The first extant copy of this book dates to 1577, but it may have been composed earlier in the sixteenth century.⁶ In the introduction, the anonymous author states that he “submitted to the opinions of wise men” (āḳvāl-i ḥukemāya ittibāʿ) that he found in “books on agriculture” (kütüb-i filāḥa), as well as “what [he] had heard from the practitioners” (ehl-i tecrībeden istimāʿ eyledügüm). He claims that he decided to write the treatise during the “construction” (taʿmīr) of his own “garden” (ravza) near Edirne.⁷ Throughout the text, the author relies on ancient scholars also cited in the Nabataean Agriculture, such as “Ṣaghriṯh” and “Yanbūshād”; he further references “Qaṣṭūs.” Whether the author gained his knowledge of Ibn Wahshiyya’s and Qastus’s works from the copies held in the palace library is uncertain. However, the emphasis he places on these works, out of the dozens of agricultural treatises circulating in the Eastern Mediterranean at the time, is striking. It suggests that the royal library may have played an important role in the production of agricultural knowledge and its dissemination, even outside the palace, or that the palace may have collected books that were already part of a wider discourse in the Ottoman learned society. Indeed, members of the palace administration and janissaries—the same kinds of people who may have had access to the royal library—were investing in commercial farming in Edirne and across Thrace by the mid-sixteenth century.⁸

The roots of a burgeoning Ottoman discourse on agriculture can thus be investigated by tracking the acquisition of books on the subject in the palace library. As I will argue, the interest in agricultural works had already been growing among Ottoman scholars and other urban elites: Wahshiyya's and Qastus's works would have been sought after by an audience that, by the first decade of the sixteenth century, was heavily invested in the establishment of new agricultural spaces in and around the capital Istanbul. The Ottoman palace administration itself had a vested interest in agriculture, as it transformed land into royal gardens that grew produce to be sold on the market. By the 1520s, "royal gardens" (bāğçeḥā-i ḥāṣṣa) had proliferated around Istanbul, expanding to other areas outside the city walls and along the Bosphorus. Seven of these royal gardens yielded an income of 150,752 aspers (aḳçe) in 1524–25 for the Inner Treasury from the sale of flowers, vegetables, and fruits, presumably on the Istanbul market.⁹ At the same time, produce gardens were becoming standard features of sultanī charitable foundation complexes. Thus, the presence in the royal library of the two "seeds" of a canon on agriculture—texts that the author of the Revnaḳ-ı Būstān cites alongside what he learned from practitioners—should be seen against the background of an increased interest in commercial farming. At the end of this essay, I will briefly note a parallel process that unfolded in the first two decades of the sixteenth century in late Mamluk Cairo, where manuscripts on agriculture were collected, copied, and written.

The clean copy of the inventory from 1503/4 has a subheading: "Description of books on medicine and [what is related to medicine with respect to books on toxicology and agriculture] (Tafṣīlu al-kutub al-ṭibbiyyati [wa-mā yata'allāqu bi-al-ṭibbi bi-jihatin min al-jihāti kakutubi al-sumūmi wa-kutubi al-falāḥati])."¹⁰ The second part of the subheading, indicated above in brackets, is written in smaller letters over the words "Description of books on medicine," in the empty space the librarian had left for additional books in the previous section (on mysticism, etc.). The second part of the subheading, which appears to have been a correction to the first part, is also found verbatim in the table of contents at the beginning of the inventory. This is the only case in the inventory where part of a subheading is written in smaller letters above the rest of the subheading. It is possible that the scribe transcribing the inventory in a clean copy in 1503/4 made updates to the original version, which was drawn up in 1502/3. The creation of the inventory should therefore not be seen as a finite event, but rather as an ongoing process. Indeed, this is already shown by the empty spaces that were left throughout the inventory, especially the spaces at the end of each section intended for inserting new titles. At the end of the section on medicine, directly after the listing of books on agriculture, there are three empty pages.¹¹ The placement of all nine books on agriculture at the very end of the section on medicine may reflect the physical arrangement of these books in the royal library, where the books on agriculture were most likely clustered in a single shelf that served as the kernel for a growing field of interest.

Extant manuscripts on agriculture held today in the Topkapı Palace Museum Library and elsewhere further indicate that the palace library acquired more works on the subject soon after the inventory was drawn up. For instance, there is a copy of the fourth part (juz) of the Nabataean Agriculture now in the Topkapı library that, according to the flyleaf, was created "by order of the treasury" (bi-rasm khizānati) of the Mamluk sultan Qansuh al-Ghawri (r. 1501–16).¹² This manuscript may have been brought to Istanbul, together with the third part (al-juz' al-thalās) of the Nabataean Agriculture now in the Süleymaniye Library's Turhan Sultan collection (which originated in the palace library), by the Ottoman sultan Selim I (r. 1512–20) following the conquest of Cairo.¹³ The Leiden University Library holds the eighth volume (al-juz' al-thāmin) from this same copy of the Nabataean Agriculture, which is likewise dedicated to Qansuh al-Ghawri.¹⁴ It is part of the collection of books that the Dutch ambassador in Istanbul, Levinus Warner (d. 1665), assembled during his stay in Istanbul. More research should be undertaken regarding which of the books that had been removed from the royal library of Qansuh al-Ghawri were acquired by the royal library in Istanbul, and how such works relate to the specific scholarly interests reflected in the inventory.

As noted above, of the nine books on agriculture listed in this section, the inventory lists only one work by its title: Kitāb Qasṭawīs (Book of Qastawīs). This corresponds to the title of a manuscript now held in the Topkapı Palace library collection, which is vocalized in the same distinctive manner: "Qaṣṭawīs" instead of "Qaṣṭūs." The manuscript also bears an almond-shaped seal that is damaged, as if someone had tried to erase it. What remains of the seal, however, strongly resembles the seal of Bayezid II.¹⁵ The flyleaf also contains two legible ownership notes, of a "Mehmed known as Süleyman Ağazade" and of a shaykh from the Mevlevi order, "Haṣmet Dede el-Mevlevi." Two further notes have been erased to the point of illegibility, which may represent an attempt to destroy evidence that the manuscript was part of the collection of the royal library, just like the erasure of the seal (fig. 1). It is also possible that these owners, who have yet to be identified, possessed the manuscript before it entered the royal library. At any rate, the ownership notes indicate that this manuscript had a prior life, or an afterlife, outside of the royal library. Our inventory records several manuscripts that were "given away" (itā' olundu), including the al-Jāmi'u fī al-mufradāti li-Ibn al-Bayṭār (Compendium of Ibn al-Baytar),¹⁶ a thirteenth-century Andalusian pharmacopoeia focused on various plants and their medicinal uses. Some of the books on agriculture listed in the inventory may have been borrowed from the library, perhaps by palace gardeners or physicians. Other high-ranking bureaucrats, scholars, or practitioners may have also desired to consult these works. In an entry on the village of Müderris, north of Istanbul, the 1498 tax survey of the Haslar district records eight "farm estates of members of the state council and others" (çiftlikhā-i şudūr-ehl-i dīvān ma'a ğayrihim). Among these are viziers, a chief judge (kāzī 'asker), a şeyhülislām, and a janissary, all of whom may have had access to the royal library.¹⁷

As an assessment of the collection, one purpose of the inventory may have been to open the way for new acquisitions. At any rate, the moment such a list was drawn up, it must have created a new consciousness or awareness about the state of knowledge in various fields. The 161-page Risāla fī al-Ṭā'ūn (Treatise on the Plague), now in the British Library, has a chronogram on its flyleaf indicating that it entered the Inner Treasury in the year 917 (1510/11). The book bears two seal impressions, and although they are almost completely erased, they appear to reflect the almond-shaped seal of Bayezid II¹⁸ (fig. 2). Since the same title is recorded in the inventory,¹⁹ which was compiled before the date on the flyleaf, this means that the library must have received a second copy of the treatise after the inventory was completed. A work on the plague would have had a special importance in the first decade of the sixteenth century, when the Ottoman administration was attempting to control the spread of the plague, as it continued to do thereafter.²⁰ As previously mentioned, a similar trajectory can be discerned with the arrival of copies of the Nabataean Agriculture in the royal library from the newly conquered Cairo in 1517.

How can we identify the other books on agriculture recorded in the inventory whose titles are not given?

Fig. 2. The last page of Risāla fī al-Ṭāʿūn (Treatise on the Plague), which entered the Topkapı Palace Library in 1510/11. British Library, MS Or. 9009, fol. 1a.

Though the first eight entries of books on agriculture have generic names, it is possible to establish that the fourth, an “Abbreviated Book on Agriculture” (Mukhtaṣaru Kitābi al-falāḥati), was in fact the book by Qastus. The inventory describes it as being bound together in “one volume” (mujalladin wāḥidin), together with an abbreviated work on Shafīʿi jurisprudence and an abbreviated work on physiognomy written in Persian (Mukhtaṣaru Kitābi al-falāḥati min qibali al-ṭibbi wa-mukhtaṣarun fī fiḥhi al-Shāfiʿi wa-risālatun fārisiyyatun fī al-firāsati fī mujalladin wāḥidin).²¹ A volume that fits this description and that also bears seals of Bayezid II on its flyleaf and last page is held today in the Süleymaniye Library in Istanbul (fig. 3).²² A note on the title page of this work describes it in an identical manner as in the inventory: “abbreviated book on agriculture related to medicine and abbreviated [book] on Shafīʿi jurisprudence and a treatise (risāla) on physiognomy (firāsa).”²³ The treatise on physiognomy is indeed in Persian. The note on the manuscript may thus have been written by the same royal librarian(s) that drew up the inventory for Bayezid II. This book on agriculture must be identical to the “Book of Qaṣṭawīs” now in the Topkapı Palace library collection, which, as we have seen, was recorded in the same distinctive way in the inventory.²⁴ Moreover, that this work was listed among books on agriculture, even though its multiple volumes treat various subjects, is itself significant. In the Ottoman Turkish preface of the inventory, under the “rules of the register and its exceptions,” the librarian notes that, “if there are multiple books in a volume, it is with regard to the book which is more esteemed and whose probability of being requested is higher, or else is rare, that the bound volume is included with books under the aforesaid book’s discipline.”²⁵ Qastus’s volume on agriculture may thus have been the most requested and in demand among readers with access to the royal library.

The current collection in the Topkapı Palace Museum Library has at least six volumes on agriculture that clearly bear the seal of Bayezid II.²⁶ While additional research should be done on these manuscripts, they seem to be abbreviations or selections of the Nabataean Agriculture by Ibn Wahshiyya, which traditionally consists of seven parts.²⁷ In each of these six manuscripts, the royal librarian inserted a note on the flyleaf and first page to classify them as volumes of a “book on agriculture pertaining to medicine.” These notes strongly mirror the titles found in the palace library inventory. Four of these notes also specify that the manuscripts are a particular volume of a multivolume work: the second,²⁸ third,²⁹ fourth,³⁰ and fifth “volumes”³¹ of a “book on agriculture pertaining to medicine.” There are also adjacent notes, written in what looks to be a different hand, which specify that the books are “parts” (juz) of the Nabataean Agriculture. These notes appear to have been made at the time the copies were completed, and to have preceded the information added by the royal librarian. In three cases, the numbers of the parts of the Nabataean Agriculture that the notes provide do not correspond to the numbers written on the books by the royal librarian: what the royal librarian identifies as a "third volume," the titular note says is the fifth part of the Nabataean Agriculture; the "fourth volume" is the sixth part; and the "fifth volume" is the seventh part.

In the inventory, the first book on farming that appears under the relevant heading is Kitābu al-falāḥati min qibali al-ṭibbi fī khamsi mujalladāt (Book on Agriculture pertaining to Medicine in five volumes).³² This may refer to the four volumes now in the Topkapı Palace Museum Library, which are numbered by the royal librarian from the "second" to the "fifth" volumes, with the first one apparently missing. The extant volumes were not copied by a single hand, and the manuscripts are of relatively low quality, suggesting they were not made for the royal library but rather were earlier copies acquired by the palace administration. Indeed, there is at least one book on agriculture in the Topkapı Library bearing the seal of Bayezid II that was produced much earlier in the Mamluk lands and that must have been acquired before the Ottoman conquest of Egypt in 1517.³³ According to the colophon, this book was copied at the beginning of the winter of 733 (1332/33) in Alexandria.³⁴

vidually by title, a study of the present-day collection of books on agriculture in the Topkapı Library reveals that these were indeed “abbreviated” versions or selections of the Nabataean Agriculture. The absence of Ibn Wahshiyya’s name in the inventory is striking. Yet it may have been that, just as Arabic authors often referred to Aristotle simply as the “author of the Logic” (ṣāhib al-mantiq), Ibn Wahshiyya’s work was canonical enough that his name did not need to be specified. The inventory lists several copies of the ‘Ajā’ib al-makhlūqāt wa-gharā’ib al-mawjūdāt (Wonders of Creation and the Strange Things Existing) by al-Qazwini (d. 1283), in Turkish, Arabic, and Persian.³⁵ In sections on fruit trees and vegetables, this work notably quotes “the author of the Agriculture” (ṣāhib al-falāḥa), a reference to Ibn Wahshiyya.³⁶

When did books on agriculture first enter the royal library? In fact, a written discourse on agriculture had already been emerging in Istanbul during the reign of Bayezid II’s father, Mehmed II (r. 1451–81), who was the founder of the royal library collection at the Topkapı Palace. A copy of the Nabataean Agriculture now in the Beyazıt Library in Istanbul has a colophon indicating it was copied for Mehmed II, without specifying a date.³⁷ In the Yapı Kredi Sermet Çifter Library, there is also another manuscript entitled Felāḥātnāme (Book on Agriculture), written in Turkish, whose scribe specifies that he copied it in 1027 (1617) and attributes it to the Timurid astronomer-mathematician ‘Ali al-Qushji (d. 1474), a member of Mehmed II’s court in the early 1470s.³⁸ Only seven pages long, the work is bound together with a copy of the Revnak-ı Būstān. It treats such subjects as the planting and grafting of trees, and the making of olive oil and vinegar. This short work on agriculture, which was later attributed to ‘Ali al-Qushji, has drawn little attention in scholarship. ‘Ali al-Qushji is not known to have produced a work in Turkish, however, preferring instead Arabic and Persian, which were the main languages of the sciences in the fifteenth century. The scribe, writing in 1617, by which time (following the Revnak-ı Būstān) there was a tradition of Ottoman Turkish books on agriculture, may have simply invented the attribution.

Yet ‘Ali al-Qushji’s arrival in Istanbul circa 1472 coincided with an increased economic interest in agriculture among the Ottoman administration. The new mosque complex of Mehmed II, completed in 1470, earned considerable income from fruits, vegetables, and flowers planted in its four gardens, which are referred to in the records as “the garden of the new mosque” (bāğçe-i cāmi‘-i cedīd), “the garden of the hospital” (bāğçe-i dār al-ṣifā), “the garden of the hospice” (bāğçe-i ‘imāret), and “the garden of the pantry” (bāğçe-i kilār).³⁹ Moreover, in 1465, construction had been completed on the “New Palace” later known as Topkapı, the gardens of which were described by a contemporary historian as “abounding in various sorts of plants and trees, and producing beautiful fruit.”⁴⁰ The 1505 inventory of the Inner Treasury at the Topkapı Palace lists the income of the imperial garden as two coffers of 150,000 and 100,000 aspers each.⁴¹ Another contemporary source states that the gardens’ produce was sold at the piazza in front of the Topkapı Palace’s main gate.⁴² Commercial farming was thus emerging both as a form of royal self-representation and as a means of generating income. The interest in agricultural knowledge at the time also resonates with developments taking place in northern Italy; it is perhaps no accident that a number of artists and scholars from that region rendered their services to Mehmed II.⁴³ In 1472, the Roman-period agricultural works of Cato, Varro, Columella, and Palladius were edited and published as Scriptores Rei Rusticae in Venice.⁴⁴ In such an environment, it is quite plausible that ‘Ali al-Qushji indeed wrote the short work on agriculture that would be attributed to him. Just a few decades later, another Iranian astronomer would venture to write about farming: ‘Abd al-‘Ali ibn Muhammad ibn Husayn al-Birjandi (d. 1525) wrote a book in Persian at the turn of the sixteenth century entitled Ma‘rifat-i Falāḥat: Davāz-dah Bāb-i Kishāvarz (Expertise in Agriculture: Twelve Chapters on Agriculture).⁴⁵ From Italy to Central Asia, then, agricultural knowledge was gaining currency at that time.

If studied on its own, the cross-referential web of books in the palace library inventory and beyond begins to loom so large that it can seem to provide its own context. It is perhaps for this reason that the work of ‘Ali al-Qushji, like that of other scholars, is so often characterized as unfolding in a kind of “ivory tower,” separate from the economic and spatial realities of Istanbul. Likewise, from the inventory alone, one might assume that there was little interest in agriculture in the Ottoman scholarly world. Yet we should bear in mind that the inventory tells only part of the story. Primary sources, though scattered and still under-researched, imply that there was already an Ottoman written discourse on agriculture at the time.⁴⁶ Earlier Ottoman epistemology had already recognized agriculture as a distinct body of knowledge (ilm). The influential Ottoman scholar and statesman Muhammad Shah al-Fanari (d. 1435) includes the science of farming (ilm al-filāḥa) in the classification of the sciences in his Unmūdhaj al-ʿulūm (Program of the Sciences) of 1424.⁴⁷ He names three fundamentals (uṣūl) of this ilm: evaluating the soil, protecting grains such as wheat and barley after the harvest, and cultivating a grape with healing properties.

As mentioned above, the waqf income and expenditure records of Mehmed II's mosque complex in Istanbul from 1489–90 refer to a garden "of the hospital" with its own gardener named 'Abdullah, who grew "fruits and roses" (meyve ve gül) and was paid two aspers per day.⁴⁸ Yet apparently the produce of the garden was not enough to satisfy the hospital's needs; the same records note large sums spent by the hospital on fruits, vegetables, and flowers.⁴⁹ The link between agriculture and medicine reflected in the 1502–3 palace library inventory was rooted in actual medical practice and the institutional role that knowledge about agriculture played therein. Indeed, the aforementioned manuscript on the plague that entered the royal library in 1510–11 strongly emphasizes prevention and cure by the consumption of many of the same fruits, vegetables, and flowers that were purchased by the hospital in the complex of Mehmed II.⁵⁰

The two Turkish translations of the endowment deed of Bayezid II's charitable foundation in Edirne, which was established in 1488, show evolving provisions related to the gardeners. Both state that "someone knowledgeable" (māḥir kişi) in the "science of farming" (fenn-i filāḥat) should be appointed as the gardener in the mosque complex,⁵¹ which incorporated a hospital, a hospice, and a school. The translations also stipulate that two assistants should be appointed for the gardener; they specify that the gardener's monthly salary would be 120 aspers [twice the salary of Abdullah above] and the salary of the assistants would be 90 aspers. Importantly, the work of the assistants is defined as bostāncılık—"gardening," but specifically in the sense of working in a produce garden or bostānluk. The use of differentiated terms to refer to the different labors of the master gardener and the apprentices—the science of farming for the former, and bostāncılık for the latter—is striking. Moreover, rather than the more common bostān, "orchard," the document uses a variant of the vernacular bostānluk, which seems to have been specifically connected to produce gardens in urban areas during this period. For instance, the 1455 Ottoman survey of Galata and Istanbul names in the "Quarter of Samona" a poor Armenian named Marko, who rented a "produce garden" (bostānluk) from the state treasury in the moat of the Galata city walls.⁵²

We have seen how the inclusion of books on agriculture in the inventory, and the royal library's ongoing acquisition of such books, shortly preceded the creation of a novel work on the subject in Ottoman Turkish. Interestingly, a similar trajectory can be traced in the first decades of the sixteenth century in Cairo, where the Damascene scholar Radi al-Din al-Ghazzi (d. 1529) wrote a novel work entitled Jāmiʿ farāʿid al-milāḥa fī jawāmiʿ fawāʿid al-filāḥa (Complete Rules for Elegance in All the Uses of Farming).⁵³ Though Ghazzi was renowned as a judge and scholar in Damascus, this manuscript was written in Cairo in 1510–11, according to a colophon in the copy of the work now held in the National Library in Cairo.⁵⁴ The British Library copy of Ghazzi's book contains an ownership note in Arabic of one Ahmad bin Mohammad bin Hasan al-Samsuni,⁵⁵ most likely the son of the prominent Ottoman scholar and judge Molla Muhyiddin Mehmed b. Molla Hasan el-Samsuni, who died in 919 (1513/14).⁵⁶ Another note at the end of this copy also records that it was purchased in 1551 in Istanbul⁵⁷—clear proof that Ghazzi's work was available to Ottoman scholars in the first half of the sixteenth century.

In 1503/4—the same year our copy of the royal library inventory was drawn up in Istanbul—the Mamluk envoy Emir Azbak traveled to the Ottoman court to deliver "four prize horses for Ibn 'Uthman [i.e., the Ottoman sultan], with bales of seeds of Egyptian clover (bersīm) for the horses' fodder."⁵⁸ It is worth noting that Ghazzi's treatise on farming, which was soon received in the Ottoman scholarly world, included an entry on Egyptian clover, describing it as a fodder plant for animals such as horses, and specifying that it should be planted every year.⁵⁹ In the first decades of the sixteenth century, both clover seeds and a book describing methods for cultivating them traveled between Cairo and Istanbul, as did a scholar who was highly knowledgeable about agriculture. Plants were also increasingly on the move within the various regions of the Mamluk state itself. The Mamluk historian Ibn Iyas (d. 1522) states that various fruiting and flowering trees were imported in 1506–7 from northern Syria to Cairo, with their roots earthed in wooden boxes, and were planted in the newly constructed garden beneath the citadel.⁶⁰

Around 1500, a debate was also intensifying between Mamluk Cairo and Ottoman Istanbul over the right to rule the Holy Cities of Mecca and Medina. The Mamluk envoy Janibak in the court of Bayezid II was told that the Holy Cities should be ruled by someone with royal lineage, “sultan son of the sultan” (sultān bin sultān)—that is, Bayezid II—rather than the son of unbelievers, a dig at Mamluk rulers’ non-royal non-Muslim origins. Janibak answered that knowledge was more important than descent.⁶¹ The creation of the palace library inventory may thus have been fueled, at least to some degree, by intellectual competition with the Mamluks. In 1505, Bayezid II and Qansuh al-Ghawri paralleled each other by establishing large charitable foundations in the centers of Istanbul and Cairo. Large Ottoman sultanic foundations had already been established in the late fifteenth century in Istanbul (1470), Amasya (1484), and Edirne (1488). The growth of the royal library of Bayezid II must have been connected to the rise of these sprawling complexes, centers of learning with their own endowed public libraries that probably received books or copies from the royal library.

Finally, the emphasis placed on the “Book of Qastawis,” the work referred to in at least two of the nine entries on agriculture in the palace library inventory, may have broader significance. The introduction to this work describes its author as a “scholar of Rum” (‘ālim al-Rūm), an area the Ottomans associated with the Balkans and Anatolia, lands that had been part of the ancient Roman empire.⁶² To be a “Rumi” was to know, refer to, and implement those compendia of knowledge created by the “ancient” Rumis. An interest in Qastus’s work may thus have reflected particular concerns about geography, identity, and what kinds of agricultural production and knowledge were specific to Ottoman regions. The agricultural knowledge of a “scholar of Rum” like Qastus would have been desirable to a new Ottoman elite eager to self-identify as Roman. Qastus had gone into much greater depth than any other author about grapevines: detailing their planting, grafting, tending, and processing into wine and vinegar. Grapevines are the first tree Qastus discusses, and he devotes an entire part (juzʿ) to them.⁶³ (By contrast, Ibn Wahshiyā gives the pride of place to the olive tree.)⁶⁴ It is therefore striking that the author of the Revnaḳ-ı Būstān, too, focuses overwhelmingly on grapevines and discusses them at length. Qastus is the first author he cites, and he refers to Qastus a number of times, particularly with regard to grapevines.

The nine entries on agriculture listed in the inventory may seem minor in comparison to the several thousand volumes listed in total. However, the incorporation of “agriculture” in the name of a subsection on medicine that includes only nine books on agriculture is in itself significant. The royal library’s collection of books on agriculture should be seen in light of the growing interest in agriculture among the palace administration and various urban elites, many of whom by the end of the fifteenth century were already invested in farming operations around Istanbul. By the time the Revnaḳ-ı Būstān was written in the mid-sixteenth century, this process would accelerate further. The books on agriculture listed in the inventory were the seeds of an agricultural canon that would soon bear fruit in the creation of a novel work in Ottoman Turkish. Numerous copies of the Revnaḳ-ı Būstān are found throughout former Ottoman lands in manuscript libraries stretching from Mosstar to Damascus.⁶⁵ Thus, the case of books on agriculture suggests that the inventory of Bayezid II’s palace library should be seen as a fascinating record of scholarly interests in flux.

LIST OF ENTRIES

BOOKS ON AGRICULTURE

(Tafṣīlu ... kutubi al-falāḥati)

1. “Kitābu al-falāḥati” (Book on Agriculture). MS Török F. 59, 172 {1}; Arabic. According to the inventory, this book contains five volumes (fī khamṣi mujalladātin).
It is possible that the four volumes in the Topkapı Palace Library (Karatay, A 1989/2–3; A 1989/5; A 1989/6; and A 1989/7) were part of this five-volume set. Each bears the seal of Bayezid II. On the first pages, the royal librarian numbers them as volumes two, three, four, and five, respectively, of a “book on farming pertaining to medicine.” For instance, the royal librarian describes one of the Topkapı Palace Library manuscripts (A 1989/2–3) on its flyleaf as “Second volume from the Book on Agriculture, pertaining to medicine” (Mujalladun thānin min Kitābi al-falāḥati min qibali al-ṭibbi); A 1989/5 is described as the “third volume”; A 1989/6 as the “fourth volume”; and A 1989/7 as the “fifth volume” of “The Book on Agriculture, pertaining to medicine.” These four volumes are abbreviations of Ibn Waḥshiyya’s Nabataean Agriculture. Another hand on the flyleaves describes the volumes as “a part” (juzʿ) of the Nabataean Agriculture: A 1989/2–3 as the “second” part, A 1989/5 as the “third,” A 1989/6 as the “sixth,” and A 1989/7 as the “seventh.”
EDITION: Tawfiq Fahd, ed., al-Filāḥa al-nabaṭiyya: al-Tarjama al-manḥūla ilā Ibn Waḥshiyya, Abū Bakr Aḥmad ibn ʿAlī ibn Qays al-Kasdānī (Damascus: al-Maʿhad al-ʿIlmī al-Faransī li-l-Dirāsāt al-ʿArabiyya, 1993).
- 2–3. “Kitābi al-falāḥati.” MS Török F. 59, 172 {1–2}; two copies, Arabic.
4. “Mukhtaṣaru Kitābi al-falāḥati.” MS Török F. 59, 172 {2}; Arabic.
5. Same as above. MS Török F. 59, 172 {3–4}, Süleymaniye Library, Ayasofya 3688; Arabic. The inventory describes it as bound together in “one volume” (mujalladin wāḥidin) with an abbreviated work on Shafiʿi jurisprudence and an abbreviated work on physiognomy in Persian: Mukhtaṣaru Kitābi al-falāḥati min qibali al-ṭibbi wa-mukhtaṣarun fī fiqhī al-shāfiʿī wa-risālatun fārisiyyatun fī al-firāsati fī mujalladin wāḥidin (“Abbreviation of The Book on Agriculture, pertaining to medicine; and abbreviated [book] on Shafiʿi jurisprudence; and a treatise [risāla] on physiognomy in one volume”). A volume that fits this description and that also bears the seal of Bayezid II on its flyleaf and last page is held in the Süleymaniye Library (Ayasofya 3688). On its title page, it is identified similarly (and probably by the same librarian) as Mukhtaṣaru Kitābi al-falāḥati min qibali al-ṭibbi wa-mukhtaṣarun fī fiqhī al-shāfiʿī wa-risālatun fārisiyyatun fī al-firāsati (“Abbreviation of the Book on Agriculture, pertaining to medicine; and an abbreviated [book] on Shafiʿi jurisprudence; and a treatise on physiognomy in Persian”). The book on agriculture is identical to one of the Arabic translations of the Filāḥat al-rūmiyya (Roman Agriculture), a sixth-century work by Qastūs Ibn Iskulastīqa (Cassianus Bassus Scholasticus). Rather than Iskulastīqa, the introduction to the Süleymaniye copy states that the work was authored by “Qasṭūs b. Iskūrāsribka,” the “scholar from Rūm,” whose work was “known as Warznāma [Book on Planting] in Persian and [likewise] as Kitāb al-zarʿ in Arabic.”
EDITION: Qastūs Ibn Iskulastīqa, Kitāb al-zarʿ, ed. Būrāwī al-Ṭarābulī (Qartāj: al-Majmaʿ al-Thaqāfi li-l-ʿUlūm wa-al-Ādāb wa-al-Funūn, 2010).
6. “Kitābu al-falāḥati.” MS Török F. 59, 172 {4–5}.
7. Same as above. MS Török F. 59, 172 {5}.

8. Same as above. MS Török F. 59, 172 {6–7}.
9. “Kitāb Qaṣṭawīs fī al-falāḥati.” MS Török F. 59, 172 {7–8}, Karatay, E.H. 1700. A book with the same title is held in the Topkapı Library, whose title is vocalized as Kitāb Qaṣṭawīs on the flyleaf, as in the inventory. In the introduction, the sixth-century author Cassianus Bassus Scholasticus is identified as Qaṣṭawīs bin Iskūrāsribka (Qaṣṭūs bin Iskūlāstika), as in the Süleymaniye volume (no. 5 above), and he is described as a “scholar from Rūm,” with the title of his work given in Persian as Warznāma and in Arabic as Kitāb al-zarʿ. The Topkapı copy is identical in content to the one held in the Süleymaniye. It bears an illegible almond-shaped seal, most likely that of Bayezid II, on fol. 1a. There are two legible ownership notes, one of “Muḥammad known as Süleymān Ağāzāde,” and another of “Ḥaṣmet Dede al-Mawlawī,” a shaykh from the Mawlawiyya order.

EDITION: Qaṣṭūs Ibn Iskulastika, Kitāb al-zarʿ, ed. Būrāwī al-Ṭarābulī (Qarṭāj: al-Majmaʿ al-Thaqāfi li-l-ʿUlūm wa-al-Ādāb wa-al-Funūn, 2010).

ON THE WORKS OF A HISTORICAL NATURE IN THE BAYEZID II LIBRARY INVENTORY

It is commonly accepted that the reigns of Mehmed II (r. 1444–46, 1451–81) and Bayezid II (r. 1481–1512) represent an important turning point in Ottoman history writing and, indeed, in the ways in which the Ottomans understood history.¹ Byzantine, Balkan, and Arab historians had written about Ottoman history almost immediately after the rise of this dynasty to prominence in the early fourteenth century.² At a more popular level, stories and anecdotes about the deeds of the Ottoman dynasty, recounted in the Anatolian Turkish vernacular, circulated orally. From the mid-fifteenth century onwards, on the other hand, the Ottoman palace developed a new fondness for, and attention to, history writing. According to the historian Ruhi (d. after 1511), Bayezid II complained about the absence of works on the history of the Ottoman dynasty, and intimated that the history of the prophets overshadowed the study of Ottoman history. Another historian, Mevlana Neşri (d. 1520?), admittedly saw a scarcity of historical works written in the Turkish vernacular, and committed himself to fill this lacuna.³ Eventually, Idris Bidlisi (d. 1520) and Kemalpaşazade Ahmed's (d. 1534) histories of the Ottoman dynasty, the first in Persian and the second in an elaborate and Persianate Ottoman Turkish, reached a new level of historiographical sophistication and cultural achievement in the early decades of the sixteenth century.⁴

The historical entries of Bayezid II's library inventory offer precious clues about the state of Ottoman history writing, and of Ottoman historical learning, before the significant increase in historical output under Selim I (r. 1512–20) and Süleyman (r. 1520–66). While the rise of dynastic historiography has been mostly described as a sui generis cultural process that mostly unfolded in

Ottoman Turkish, the holdings of the palace library shed light on the historical works that the elite read (whereas scholarly attention has been mostly directed at what they wrote), collected, and preserved. The library inventory also illuminates the rich linguistic, stylistic, and thematic origins and inspirations of Ottoman historical culture beyond Ottoman Turkish and the Ottoman lands, extending throughout the late medieval Islamic world. As such, it helps identify some of the influences manifested in the works of sixteenth-century Ottoman historians, such as the use of a high chancery style in historical prose, and the popularity of regnal history over dynastic and world-historical works.⁵

Discussing the influence of a political center on the production of history tends to invite arguments about the relationship between legitimacy and propaganda, which may be partially valid in the Ottoman case as well. At a time when the Ottoman enterprise re-centered itself on the Byzantine capital of Constantinople, and the political and cultural/religious aura around the sultan increasingly distinguished him from the members of his own elite, sympathetic narratives about the achievements of the Ottoman dynasty came to play a specific role. Beyond the easily identified and often misinterpreted relationship between history and propaganda, however, "history" (tārīkh/tawārīkh) served as an important tool through which the past and present of the Ottoman polity were discussed and reconceived.⁶ Indeed, the new Ottoman "historical culture" included "habits of thought, languages, and media of communication, and patterns of social convention that embrace[d] elite and popular, narrative and non-narrative modes of discourse."⁷ This historical culture manifested itself in works of history, as well as in increased references to history and historical precedent in law, poetry, administrative documents, and political debates.⁸

At a time when the Ottoman political center increased its power through more intensive record-keeping practices, the emergence of an inventory for the palace library was quite likely not a coincidence. As the compiler ‘Atufi states in his Turkish introduction to the inventory, he saw his work as giving a certain order to a pre-existing group of artifacts through classification. According to ‘Atufi’s Arabic introduction, where the agency of his patron is articulated more clearly, this classification project was commissioned by Bayezid II (for both introductions, see Appendices IV and V at the end of this volume).⁹ Classification according to subject matter had a practical aim as well: it made works collected in the palace library more easily identifiable through access to an inventory. One may speculate that, in addition to librarians and sultans, the inventory may have been intended to serve as a lending library for the members of the elite. These objectives are observed in the collection’s “historical” section, which constitutes the subject of our contribution. We place quotation marks around “historical” here to differentiate our scholarly—and narrower—understanding of history/historia/tārīkh from the compiler’s more ecumenical understanding of a past that was transmitted through a wide variety of narratives.

‘Atufi’s section on “historical” works is divided into several categories, as seen in the title he utilizes for this general section: Taḥṣīl kutub al-siyar wa-al-tawārīkh wa-kutub ādāb al-ḥarb wa-kutub umūr al-riyāsa wa-al-saltāna wa-al-siyāsa wa-kutub al-furūsiyya wa-al-bayṭara ya’nī farasnāma wa-kutub bāznāma wa-kutub sagnāma wa-kutub ‘ajā’ib al-makhlūqāt [ay bayṭarnāma] wa-kutub ṣuwar al-aqālīm (for translations of these items, see the discussion below).¹⁰ The section title reflects ‘Atufi’s—and his contemporaries’—understanding of history as a practical form of knowledge that pertains to the study of the past, as well as the past and present knowledge of statecraft, the arts of war, horsemanship, falconry and houndsmanship, veterinary science, cosmography, and geography. It should be noted, however, that the number of “historical” works is considerably larger than the other types of works included in this section. In the present essay, our discussion is limited to the works listed under al-siyar (biography) and al-tawārīkh (history) subsections, as well as the entries in other catalogue sections that are labeled by ‘Atufi as fi al-tawārīkh (“on history proper”) or min qibal al-tawārīkh (“pertaining to history,” see below).

Under the main section title, the first subsection listed is al-siyar; it includes sixty-seven entries and lists works that focus on religious and prophetic history, as well as what could be called early Islamic history and lore. The second subsection, al-tawārīkh, mostly includes works on the history of Islamic dynasties from the Ghaznawids to the Ottomans, among whom the Mongols are seamlessly incorporated. This largest subsection, with two hundred forty-one entries, also lists collections of pseudo-historical anecdotes, such as the Book of Alexander (Iskandar-nāma), the animal fables of Kalīla wa Dimna, the stories of the Thousand and One Nights, the heroic adventures of the Romance of Antār, the folk tales of the Marzubān-nāma, etc. The following subsections are considerably shorter than the two previous ones: ādāb al-ḥarb (the arts of war, seventeen entries); umūr al-riyāsa wa-al-saltāna wa-al-siyāsa (matters of rulership, sultanate, and politics, thirty entries); al-furūsiyya wa-al-bayṭara, farasnāma, bāznāma, sagnāma (horsemanship, veterinary science, falconry, houndsmanship, twenty entries); and ‘ajā’ib al-makhlūqāt and ṣuwar al-aqālīm (the wonders of creation and the features of the climes, i.e., cosmography and geography, forty-six entries).

Apart from this ordering, ‘Atufi utilizes two additional markers of classification that are typically inserted at the end of the titles: min qibal al-tawārīkh and fi al-tawārīkh. This is ‘Atufi’s primary way of distinguishing between what he sees as “pertaining to history,” and “history proper.” Thus, while he lists works of dynastic and regnal history together with collections of historical anecdotes under al-tawārīkh, he is careful to establish an internal distinction between the quality of historical information provided in different works by labeling them according to this two-fold classification. These two labels also allow us to identify sixty additional entries in other sections of the inventory that are categorized as “pertaining to history” or “history proper.” Most of these seem to have been left out of the historical section because they are written in verse and are thus seen by ‘Atufi as belonging chiefly to literature.

The “historical” section of the inventory has been studied previously by Miklós Maróth, who identified several of its challenges, such as the use of abridged titles, the absence of the names of authors except in rare instances, and descriptive phrases used instead of titles.¹¹ Maróth also emphasized the trilingual (Arabic, Persian, Turkish) nature of the collection, and suggested links between the Ottoman search for legitimacy and the collection and preservation of works such as the Book of Alexander. He further drew attention to the affinity between the Ottomans and the Turkic/Central Asian dynasties, on the basis of the existence of several works of history that dealt with these.¹² Despite his overall contribution and his meticulous identification of authors and titles for several inventory entries, Maróth’s analysis is somewhat hampered by his ascription of a national(ist) character to Arab and Persian linguistic spheres and to the Ottoman-Central Asian Turkic connection. Here, our aim is to read the “historical” section of the inventory in order to ascertain the compiler’s—and, to a certain extent, the Ottoman elite’s—notions on how the past could be divided into distinct parts, and on the ways in which works dealing with the past could be categorized. In order to do this, we will follow the compiler’s own classifications and try to unpack them.

AL-SIYAR: FROM THE LIFE OF MUHAMMAD TO ISLAMIC HISTORY

The section on al-siyar represents, in the compiler’s mind, the first phase of history proper. While a few works on the history of the prophets are included in this section, the main focus is on the life of the Prophet Muhammad and the expansion of the Islamic community during the first centuries of its existence. The subsection on Muhammad’s life brings together several works around the biographical theme. Twenty-three entries list biographical works; one entry lists a volume that combines an account of Muhammad’s life with a work on political counsel (naṣīḥat al-mulūk) and one on the exploits of the caliphs and the sultans (manāqib al-khulafā’ wa al-salātīn); and another collates the history of the prophets with information on the ancestry of Muhammad (nasab), his wives and children, his companions, and the scholars of the community. Five more entries are included among works on the history of the prophets and early Islam: one of them deals with Muhammad and ‘Ali and their descendants, another with Muhammad’s nasab, and three with his biography. The later addition of these five works to the inventory suggests that the compilation was an ongoing activity, and that works probably continued to flow in while ‘Atufi drafted this document.

Nearly half of the works in the biography/history subsection are listed under the fairly generic title of siyar al-Nabī. The compiler follows the bibliographical entries with a note on the language of the work. Since Arabic is assumed as the default language, only Persian and Turkish are noted. Some of these biographical works can be identified by their distinctive titles. Uyūn al-athar fi al-shamā’il wa al-siyar (The Sources of Knowledge on the Traits and Deeds [of Muḥammad], 176 {3}) was composed by Muhammad ibn ‘Abd Allah ibn Yahya ibn Sayyid al-Nas (d. 1334), a scholar who was active in Cairo and Damascus under the Mamluks. (Two copies of the work are listed in the inventory.) Khulāṣat al-wafā’ bī akhbār dār al-Muṣṭafā (Summation of Fidelity in the Traditions of the House of Mustafa, 176 {19}–177 {1}) is by ‘Ali ibn ‘Abd Allah ibn Ahmad al-Husayni al-Samhudi (d. 1506), another scholar who lived in the Mamluk territories.

Under the category of al-siyar, the compiler also places works that deal with other aspects of religious/prophetic and Islamic history. The biographies of the Prophet Muhammad are thus followed by eight entries on the lives of the prophets, including two copies of Mawlana Jami’s (d. 1492) Shawāhid al-nubuwwa (Prophetic Testimonies, 177 {14–15}) in the original Persian, and Ishrāq al-tawārīkh (The Illumination of Histories, 177 {13–14}), an Arabic work by an Anatolian scholar, Ya‘qub ibn Idris al-Nijdi al-Qaramani (known as Qara Ya‘qub, d. 1429). One work, presented with a descriptive title, focuses on the prophets, then the Twelver Shi‘i imams and the Sunni caliphs (al-a’imma wa al-khulafā’). The following works are more specific in content: three entries on Abraham, one entry on the tribulations of Joseph (qiṣṣat Yūsuf), and two entries on the life of Solomon, with the mention that one of the latter two is illustrated (muṣawwar). The list continues with a work on the life of the Umayyad caliph 'Umar II (r. 717–20), an anonymous work on the compilers of hadith, and another anonymous title on the prominent leaders and righteous men of the Muslim community. This subsection includes works on early Islamic history, genealogy, and prosopography, such as Muhibb al-Din Tabari's (d. 1295) Ri'yāḍ al-naẓira fī manāqib al-'ashara (The Ordered Garden of Gazes on the Virtuous Deeds of the Ten, 178 {14}), al-Qashī's (d. 1116) Ra's māl al-nadīm fī tawārīkh a'yān ahl al-Islām (The Companion's Capital on the Histories of Notable Muslims, 178 {15–16}) and al-Ghazali's (d. 1111) Maqāmāt al-'ulamā' bayn yadayy al-khulafā' wa al-umarā' (Positions of the Scholars between the Hands of the Caliphs and the Commanders, 178 {18–19}).

The focus of the inventory then shifts to urban history and sacred geography through a series of entries on Mecca, Medina, Jerusalem, and Damascus. Of the twelve entries in this subsection, we see one copy of Abu Bakr al-Maraghī's (d. 1413 or 1414) Tahqīq al-nuṣra bi talkhīṣ ma'ālim dār al-hijra (The Verification of Victory in the Summation of the Notable Sights of Madina, 179 {3}); four works on the history and attributes of Mecca; two copies of Shihab al-Din al-Maqdisi's (d. 1374) Muthīr al-gharām (The Arouser of Passions, 179 {5–6}) on Damascus and Jerusalem; and five works on the conquest of Syria, two of them in Turkish, possibly related to al-Waqidi's (d. 823) Futūḥ al-Shām (The Conquests of Syria, 179 {12}). Two epic romances in Turkish, one on Battal Gazi, and the other on Abu Muslim, round out the subsection on al-sīyar.

The compiler's listing in this section is far from random, and it seems to be a reflection of important notions on historical periodization. These notions are illustrated by a note following an entry on the lives of the prophets, caliphs, and kings. The compiler informs us that this work covers the period up to the year 422 (1030). The inclusion of Battal Gazi and Abu Muslim in this section is similarly meaningful, since their mythical careers roughly refer to the same period. In the compiler's understanding, history proper is a process that starts with the Prophet Muhammad and continues with the caliphs and the story of the Islamic community in general, with its scholars and other prominent members. The first phase of this story, however, ends somewhere between the mid-eleventh and mid-thirteenth centuries, coinciding with the decline of Abbasid power in Baghdad, the shock of the crusades, the rise of various political dynasties throughout the Islamic world, and, finally, the arrival of the Mongols from the first decades of the thirteenth century onwards. Another important distinction emerges between a genre of history that is directly related to forms of religious authority, which is included in this subsection, and another that is related to forms of what might be called sultanic/dynastic authority, which is covered in the following subsection.

AL-TAWĀRĪKH: DYNASTIC HISTORIES, FROM THE SELJUQS TO THE OTTOMANS

In a significant attempt to assert the prominence of Ottoman history within the larger narratives of Islamic prophetic and dynastic history, this section opens with twenty-two entries on Ottoman history, which vary between short texts on individual events (such as the accession of Bayezid II or the circumcision of his sons), longer texts on the conquests of Mehmed II and Bayezid II (such as the capture of Constantinople, Euboea, and Morea), and individual works that are devoted to the reign of Mehmed II as well as to Ottoman dynastic history, both as part of universal history and as an autonomous narrative. Five copies of Şükrullah Şihabuddin Ahmed's (fl. 1464) Persian Bahjat al-tawārīkh (The Splendor of Histories, 280 {16–17}), a universal history, are listed in the inventory; only two of these are said to include sections on the Ottoman dynasty.

The subsection on Ottoman history sheds light on the state of Ottoman historiographical production as a work in progress. The language of the works is not always specified, and the length of the historical works varies considerably. Some are given the label of qiṣṣa (story), while a few are called risāla (treatise). One work on the reign of Mehmed II is categorized as tawārīkh, and another as kitāb; a history of the Ottoman dynasty is also classified as kitāb. An abridged (mukhtaṣar) general Ottoman history is bound in a volume that also includes a Persian treatise on philosophy, a short treatise on the life of Ibn Sina (d. 1037), and a list of Ibn Sina's works. Another group of entries on Ottoman history is listed elsewhere in the inventory. Three titles, under geography, deal with the history of Constantinople and the church of Hagia Sophia. Twelve works in verse, under literature, consist of ghazā-nāma. Five of these feature a generic title focused on the exploits of Mehmed II; Bayezid II's campaigns are represented by works on the conquest of Morea (possibly by Seyyid Mehmed el-Münşi), the conquest of Nafpaktos and Motoni (by Safa'i), his "European" conquests ("fath ba'd wilāyat Afranj," possibly referring to the capture of locales from the Venetians, including the ones mentioned earlier), and a generic title on his ghazawāt. There are two histories in verse on the Ottoman dynasty from the time of Bayezid II, and an Ushshāq-nāma (The Book of Lovers, 267 {1–2}) on Emir Süleyman (d. 1411), the son of Bayezid I, who was one of the contenders during the Ottoman interregnum of 1402–13.

The dynastic history in the Turkish vernacular, now seen as one of the defining cultural products of the second half of the fifteenth century, does not occupy a privileged position in the historical section of the inventory. Some of these works were still being composed while the inventory was compiled. It is impossible to determine whether works predating the inventory, such as some of the popular anonymous Ottoman dynastic histories, entered the palace library. One of the most significant features of the Ottoman history subsection is the insistent ascription of the title of caliph to the Ottoman rulers; another is the emphasis on near-history, and particularly the reign of Bayezid II, whose lofty titles are listed in 'Atufi's Arabic introduction to the inventory. A tawārīkh on the reign of Mehmed II has an additional section on Bayezid II (possibly Tursun Beg's [fl. 1491] Tārīh-i Ebū'l-Feth [History of the Father of Conquest]); the latter's rule is further described in an autonomous risāla, and in the final chapter of another risāla on the Ottoman dynasty.

After the works on the Ottoman dynasty, the compiler transitions into the next subsection with three entries on the life of Alexander: a Turkish translation from Greek; a vita of Alexander in nine volumes; and a work on Alexander and the wise men (hukamā') of his time. 'Atufi continues the list with several works on what may be classified as political history. Ibn al-Athir's (d. 1233) universal history Al-kāmil fī al-tārīkh (The Perfection of Histories, in two copies, of twelve and two volumes, respectively: 182 {18}; 182 {19}) is followed by Hasan Nizami Nishapuri's (fl. 1217) Persian work on the events in the Delhi Sultanate between 1191 and 1217, titled Tāj al-ma'āthir (The Crown of Glorious Deeds, multiple copies in 183 {4} to 183 {8–9}). There are seven entries on the same work: one is a collection of excerpts, one is a single volume that is part of a non-extant multivolume set, and another is collated with Hamid al-Din Kirmani's (fl. 1188) Badā'i' al-azmān (The Wonders of the Times, 183 {4–6}). Next come four entries of al-Tabari's Histories (183 {13}–{14}), three of which are Persian translations of the Arabic original. The predominance of Persian, and of the Persianate cultural sphere, is obvious in this part of the inventory. Eight copies of Baydawi's (fl. 1286) Persian Nizām al-tawārīkh (The Ordering of Histories, 183 {17}–184 {2}) are listed in the inventory. 'Utbi's (d. 1035 or 1036) Arabic history of the Ghaznawid dynasty, Tārīkh al-yamīnī (The Correct History, 184 {7–8}–184 {13}), is present in nine copies, four of which are Persian translations. Fadl Allah Sharaf al-Din Qazwini's (d. 1339) Al-Mu'jam fī āthār mulūk al-'Ajām (The Comprehensive Collection of the Deeds of the Kings of Persia, 184 {19}–185 {5}) dedicated to Atabeg Ahmad of Lorestan (r. 1296–1330 or 1333), exists in seven Persian copies as well as one Turkish translation. The history of the Seljuq dynasty is also represented in the collection by Rawandi's (fl. 1202) Rāhat al-šudūr (The Heart's Comfort, 185 {19}) and two unattributed works, all in Persian. The combined weight of Persianate culture with Mongol and post-Mongol history is another crucial feature in the inventory. There is a single copy of Wassaf's Tārīkh (184 {17}), three Persian histories on Genghis Khan (d. 1237, one which is identified as Juwayni's [d. 1283] Tārīkh-i Jahān-Gushāy [The History of the World Conqueror, 185 {10}]), and one on Ghazan Khan (1271–1304). The first volume of a three-volume set of Rashid al-Din's (d. 1318) Jāmi' al-tawārīkh (Compendium of Chronicles, 185 {14–16}), bound with a Turkish history of Genghis Khan, is followed by a Turkish Oghūz-nāma (The Book of Oghuz, 185 {16}). Timur's reign (r. 1370–1405) is narrated in three Persian works (one or all of them possibly referring to Sharaf al-Din 'Ali Yazdi's [d. 1454] Ẓafar-nāma [The Book of Victory, 187 {2}]), and Ibn 'Arabshah's (d. 1450) 'Ajā'ib al-maqdūr fī nawā'ib Tīmūr (The Wonders of Possibility in the Acts of Timur, 187 {5}). There are six copies, in Persian, of Rashid al-Din's writings: five copies of the tawdīhat (Clarifications, 187 {9, 11–12, 13–14, 14–15, 16–17}) and one copy of sultāniyya (The Sultanic Treatise, 187 {10–11}). The chancery style that is a distinguishing feature in many of these works would eventually have a significant impact on the creation of an Ottoman high prose style in history writing from the first decades of the sixteenth century onwards.

The remaining part of the historical section does not follow the more careful categorization adopted earlier and seems to have been put together rather hastily. This probably stems from the nature of the inventory as a work in progress, whereby the compiler would continue to add new titles, sometimes quickly. Empty spaces left in between different sections and subsections in the inventory also point to the ongoing nature of the project and the compiler's intention to include more works as he went along. Here, several volumes of Qışsat 'Antar (in Arabic and Turkish), Samak-i 'Ayyār (The Rogue Fish, in Turkish and Persian), Kalīla wa Dimna, and Marzubān-nāma (in Persian and Turkish) coexist with anonymous works on dynastic and regnal history. While this section is more difficult to categorize, it offers important clues about the wide intellectual interests of the Ottoman elite, and the centers of literary and cultural production that fed those interests. Works produced in the Seljuq/Anatolian zone, such as Muhammad bin Ghazi al-Malaṭyawī's (d. 1212) Rawḍat al-'uqūl (The Garden of the Minds, 189 {1}) and Qadi Ahmad Nigdawī's (fl. 1333) Al-Walad al-shafīq (The Compassionate Scion, 190 {18–19}), which survives today in a unique manuscript¹³ are listed here, together with an anonymous Manāqib of Qadi Burhan al-Din (d. 1398). Some of these works are closer to the mirror for princes genre, such as al-Turtushī's (d. 1126 or 1127) Sirāj al-mulūk (The Lamp of Kings, 191 {9}). Biographical dictionaries, such as al-Bayhaqī's (d. 1169–70) Tatimmat Šiwān al-ḥikma (The Continuation of the Chest of Wisdom, 190 {4–5}), Ibn Khallikan's (d. 1282) Wafayāt al-a'yān wa-anbā' abnā' al-zamān (Necrology of the Notables and Reports of the Sons of the Age, 186 {3}), and Ibn al-Dawadārī's (fl. 1335) Kanz al-durar wa-jāmi' al-ghurar (The Treasury of Pearls and the Collection of Bright Ornaments, 191 {7–8}) on Mamluk history are also found in this cluster. Two fairly rare manuscripts, on the science of history, are among the entries as well: Muhammad Ibn Ibrahim Ijī's

(fl. 1381–82) Tuḥfat al-faqīr ilā šāḥib al-sarīr fī 'ilm al-tawārīkh (The Gift of the Humble Servant to the Enthroned One on the Science of History, 191 {2}), and Muḥyi al-Din al-Kafīyaji's (d. 1474) Kitāb al-mukhtaṣar al-mufīd fī 'ilm al-tārīkh (The Useful and Concise Book on the Science of History, 192 {17–18}), a manuscript that was submitted to the Ottoman grand vizier Mahmud Pasha (d. 1474).¹⁴

PRELIMINARY CONCLUSIONS

Despite its lack of clear descriptions of the content and physical attributes of several works, 'Atufi's inventory is a fascinating testimony to the state of Ottoman historical culture from the mid-fifteenth century to the first decade of the sixteenth. The inventory was compiled at a time when the Ottomans were looking to produce their own histories and inscribe their story onto the larger corpus of Islamic and dynastic histories by claiming to be the continuators of several traditions that included Sunni Islam and Turko-Mongol dynasticism. The Ottoman attempt to appropriate the legacy of the past is also seen in the considerable attention paid to the histories of the Abbasids, as well as various branches of the Seljuq dynasty. The inventory represents a moment when the Ottomans were merely beginning to engage in this fundamental effort of insertion and assertion. Finally, the existence of several works produced in the Mamluk territories underlines the intellectual exchange between the Ottomans and the Mamluks in the form of the circulation of students, scholars, and books. The inclusion of a work by al-Samhudi (d. 1506), who was alive at the time of the inventory's compilation, further underlines the ongoing nature of this intensive exchange.

Next, the inventory represents the overarching importance of the Timurid cultural environment for the Ottomans. As such, it helps illustrate the extent of the Ottoman urge to emulate the Timurids and the acute sense of cultural competition, compounded by the yearning for recognition. In terms of historiographical developments, the large number of works produced in the Timurid zone constitutes the first step of the appropriation of a Persianate idiom and aesthetic style, which would receive its specifically Ottoman expression at the hands of the bureaucrat-historians from the sixteenth century onward.¹⁵ However, the inventory's entries on Ottoman history are limited, not to say modest. They include only a few treatments of the entire span of Ottoman history, and the shorter campaign narratives constitute the majority of historical production. The titles of the works on Ottoman history, particularly in the way they are presented in the inventory, display a strong emphasis on dynastic identity and continuity. The Ottoman elites yearned to be admitted into the Persianate cultural ecumene, but through their own distinctive dynastic identity.

It is true that the inventory privileges the interests and tastes of the ruling elite, since it was prepared as a key to the palace library. At the same time, one cannot limit the importance of this project by narrowing down its cultural relevance to the elite, since the inventory includes several popular works in the Ottoman Turkish vernacular that enjoyed a fairly large audience. The fifteenth century represents a turning point in textualization and vernacularization, trends whose impact is seen in the inventory through the inclusion of collections of anecdotes, proverbs, and epics in the Ottoman Turkish vernacular. While the "historical" section is dominated by Persian and Arabic (in that order), it begins to open up to Ottoman Turkish as well, both in the form of works on history proper, as well as translations of historical and pseudo-historical material.

The inventory's approach to compilation and classification leads to a few concluding observations. For instance, the compiler considered histories in verse as literature instead of history proper, in a move that may imply a radical break from orality and a growing emphasis on literacy and textuality. Next, history, together with geography and politics, is represented as part of an arsenal of governance, despite its independent status as cultural artifact. It is placed next to the arts of war, horsemanship, falconry, and houndsmanship as a form of practical knowledge useful to the members of an expanding military-political elite. Also, canonical works of history, be they on early Islamic or Mongol history, are often present in several copies, many of them in Turkish translations: these are evidently the attributes of a lending library geared towards a group of frequent users. Finally, we must note the apparent affinities of this collection with the historical work (and periodization) of 'Abd al-rahman al-Bistami, and with the same author's classification of the sciences (see Fleischer's introductory essay in the present volume).

LIST OF ENTRIES

SECTION ON BOOKS OF BIOGRAPHY AND HISTORY, ARTS OF WAR, MATTERS OF RULERSHIP AND SULTANATE AND POLITICS, HORSEMANSHIP AND VETERINARY SCIENCE (THAT IS, BOOKS OF THE HORSE AND BOOKS OF THE VETERINARIAN), FALCONRY, AND HOUNDSMANSHIP, WONDERS OF CREATION, AND FEATURES OF THE CLIMES/GEOGRAPHY

From the general title in the inventory for this section cited above, the following entries comprise works that are listed under al-siyar (A), al-tawārikh (B), ādāb al-ḥarb (D), and al-furūsiyya wa-al-bayṭara, farasnāma, bāznāma, sagnāma (E).

Entries under umūr al-riyāsa wa-al-saltana wa-al-siyāsa (covered in the essay of Hüseyin Yılmaz) and 'ajā'ib al-makhlūqāt and ṣuwar al-aqālīm (discussed in Pınar Emiralioğlu's essay) are not included below, unless they were labeled by the cataloguer as works on or pertaining to history (fi al-tawārikh or min qibal al-tawārikh), in which case they are to be found under C. The full lists of entries included in those subsections are supplied and discussed in the abovementioned essays by colleagues working on the inventory's holdings in politics and geography, respectively.

Whenever we believe we can identify authors and locate editions and translations, we supply those. When we are able to identify an author and/or a title only, without certainty, the author's name and the title follow the original inventory entry, prefaced by either "possibly" or "probably," to show our level of confidence in the attribution.

Under C, we cross-list titles the cataloguer designated as fi al-tawārikh or min qibal al-tawārikh but that are included in other sections of the inventory. For the cross-listed works, we suggest authors as far as we can identify them but refrain from providing editions and translations, as well as translations of the works' titles.

Entries under A, B, and C are consecutively numbered, in order to emphasize the continuity among works of a historical nature; entries under D and E are numbered separately.

Needless to say, this is a first step in the identification of the works of a historical nature in the palace library inventory. Many of the entries below will have to be updated and corrected as scholars further explore manuscript collections in Istanbul and across the world.

BOOKS ON THE WONDERS OF CREATION AND GEOGRAPHY IN 'ATUFI'S INVENTORY

The inventory of Bayezid II's (r. 1481–1512) palace library, which was prepared by 'Atufi in 908 (1502–3), is a remarkable source for the history of intellectual life, science, knowledge networks, books, and libraries in the Ottoman empire.¹ A member of the ulema, 'Atufi worked at the palace library during the reign of Bayezid II and is said to have been a tutor for the palace pages.² In his 365-page inventory, 'Atufi catalogues and categorizes about five thousand volumes on a variety of topics ranging from Islamic religious sciences to Sufism, from history to medicine, and from geography to astrology. This essay offers observations and insights into 'Atufi's section on the "Wonders of Creation and Geography" (Kutub 'Ajā'ib al-Makhlūqāt wa-Kutub Şuwar al-Aqālīm). I will first highlight some general features of this category, and will then examine the selection and classification of books included in the list. The concluding section provides possible answers to the question of what this list meant for the Ottoman understanding of geography as a discipline at the turn of the sixteenth century.

ORGANIZATION, CLASSIFICATION, AND SELECTION OF BOOKS

The section on the books of Wonders of Creation and Geography appears between pages 200 and 203 of the manuscript. 'Atufi catalogues forty-eight books in this section, which comes after the books on history and biography and before the books on Arabic literature. There are six blank spaces scattered throughout this category, which itself is only four pages long. These blank spaces may signify further attempts at classification by 'Atufi, a possibility that will be discussed below.

Although there are two additional entries on geography within the books on medicine and history, the category on the Wonders of Creation and Geography is one of the shorter sections of the inventory. The number of books listed in this section constitutes less than one percent of the entire collection.

The inventory includes individual books, compendia, treatises, and translations. 'Atufi's entries are brief. Only six entries mention the author; the rest are unspecified. Of the forty-eight books, three are in Turkish, three in Persian, and the rest are in Arabic. In the case of Persian and Turkish language works, 'Atufi does not identify the authors.³

The section on books of Wonders of Creation and Geography does not follow a strict classification in terms of subject. The list contains a wide variety of works on history, geography, and cosmography. If more than one copy of a certain work is listed in the inventory, the entry is typically followed by a list of other copies, translations, and commentaries written on that work. Some works are listed in multiple sections throughout the inventory. For instance, a copy of al-Qazwini's (d. 1283) 'Ajā'ib al-Makhlūqāt wa-Gharā'ib al-Mawjūdāt (Wonders of Creation and Curiosities of Existence) also appears later in the section on the historical accounts (251 {11–12}). This reflects 'Atufi's concern that readers should find all materials relevant to their interests, a significant feature of the larger list that bears further commentary below.

The inventory contains several principal texts of medieval Islamic geography. Among the most frequently recurring works are Qazwini's aforementioned 'Ajā'ib al-Makhlūqāt wa-Gharā'ib al-Mawjūdāt, Istakhri's (tenth century) Kitāb al-Masālik al-Mamālik (Book of Roads and Kingdoms) or, as 'Atufi lists it, Kitāb Şuwar al-Aqālīm (Book of Illustrations of the Climes), and Arabic translations of Ptolemy's Geographia. Of the forty-eight books listed in this section of the inventory, ten are copies and translations of Qazwini's 'Ajā'ib al-Makhlūqāt (200 {6–14}), six are of Istakhri's Kitāb Şuwar al-Aqālīm (202 {10–14}), and three are of Ptolemy's Geographia (203 {5–9}). In addition, 'Atufi lists Ibn al-Athir's (d. 1233) Tuhfat al-'Ajā'ib wa-Ṭurfat al-Gharā'ib (Unique Wonders and Strange Curiosities, 200 {11}), Buzurg ibn Shahriyar al-Ramhurmuẓi's (tenth century) Kitāb 'Ajā'ib al-Hindi (Wonders of India, 200 {19}, 201 {4–5}), and Abu al-Fida's (d. 1331) Taqwīm al-Buldān (Survey of Countries, 201 {3–4}).

Besides these geographical works, 'Atufi also includes two unidentified treatises in this section of his inventory: Jahān-nāma fī 'Ajā'ib al-Barr wa-l-Baḥr (Book of the Universe on the Wonders of the Land and the Sea, 200 {14–15}), and Kitāb Tārīkh al-'Ibād wa-l-Bilād (History of Mankind and Countries, 200 {15–16}). He lists these two items right after the copies of Qazwini's 'Ajā'ib al-Makhlūqāt, possibly to indicate that their contents are similar. Immediately after these two accounts, 'Atufi enters three works on Constantinople into his list: Qīṣṣat Kādūm al-Wāqī'ati fī al-Quṣṭanṭīniyya (History of the Events in Constantinople, 201 {7–8}), a Turkish translation of Kitāb Quṣṭanṭīniyya wa-Ayāşūfya (Book of Constantinople and Hagia Sophia, 200 {16–17}), and a combined account on the fortifications of Constantinople and Hagia Sophia titled Kitāb Dhikr Qal'ati Quṣṭanṭīniyya wa-Binā'i Ayāşūfya (Description of Fortifications of Constantinople and of Hagia Sophia, 201 {1–2}).

After the well-known entries on the wonders of creation, universal histories, and the history of Constantinople, 'Atufi's section on Wonders of Creation and Geography moves on to the less known treatises of geography. Among the treatises on specific subjects, there are four focusing exclusively on the geography of the Islamic world: a treatise on islands and another on the histories of Jerusalem bound in a single volume: Risālatu fī al-Jazā'ir wa-Risālatu fī Tawārīkhi Bayt al-Maqdis fī Mujalladin Wāḥidin (Treatise on Algiers and Treatise on the History of Jerusalem, 201 {12–13}); Ramhurmuẓi's previously mentioned treatise on the wonders of India; and a work on the drawings of stones and their benefits, most likely an Arabic translation of a Greek or Latin lapidary, titled Kitāb fī Nuqūshi Ahjār wa-Manāfi'ihā (Drawings of Stones and Their Benefits, 201 {13–14}). In this section 'Atufi also lists al-Jazari's (d. 1206) work on mechanical devices titled al-Umūr al-'Ajībati wa-l-Ḥiyālī (Book on the Knowledge of Ingenious Mechanical Devices, 201 {16}) and a medical compendium by Jamal al-Din Qazwini (twelfth century) titled Kitāb Muḥīd al-'Ulūm wa-Mubīd al-Humūm (Book on the Useful Sciences and Destroyer of Anxieties in Wondrous Affairs, 201 {17}).

Of the three Persian works listed in the inventory, two are translations of Qazwini's 'Ajā'ib al-Makhlūqāt, and one is a translation of Ibn al-Wardī's (d. 1349) Kharīdat al-'Ajā'ib wa-Tuhfat al-Gharā'ib (Pearls of Marvels and Unique Curiosities). Of the three Turkish works, one is a translation of Qazwini's 'Ajā'ib al-Makhlūqāt, one is a translation of Kitāb Quṣṭanṭīniyya wa-Ayāşūfya, and the last one is an unidentified treatise titled 'Ajā'ib al-Afkār (Wondrous Reflections). The only entry where the name of a translator is included is the Arabic translation of Istakhri's Kitāb Şuwar al-Aqālīm (202 {10–11}) by a certain Abu al-'Abbas. The reason for this specific inclusion is unknown. It is possible that the name of the translator was identified in the manuscript.

The inventory does not include contemporary geographical or cartographical works produced in Europe. Neither does it include some of the classical works of medieval Islamic geography such as Ibn Hawqal's (tenth century) Kitāb Şūrat al-'Arḍ (Book on the Picture of the Earth) and Ibn Khurdadhbīh's (d. 912) Kitāb al-Masālik wa-l-Mamālik (Book of the Roads and Kingdoms). This is particularly surprising because the Topkapı Palace Museum Library holds the earliest copy of the Kitāb Şūrat al-'Arḍ, dated 479 (1086). The work carries Bayezid II's seal, which indicates that it entered the palace library during his reign.⁴ Its absence from the list suggests that it may have been acquired after 'Atufi's inventory was made, or perhaps the book was stored in another location. In addition, the inventory does not include or specify any original works or translations by the Ottoman cosmographer Yazıcıoğlu Ahmed Bican (d. 1456).

The inventory does not list any individual portolan charts, maps, or atlases. Contemporary portolan charts of the Mediterranean and the Black Sea prepared by al-Katibi from Tunis in 1412–13 and by Ibrahim al-Mursi in 1461 are not part of the inventory and neither are any atlases or charts prepared in Europe. Abu Zayd Ahmad b. Sahl al-Balkhi's atlas, Ashkāl wa-yā Ṣuwar al-Aqālīm al-Sab'a (Figures or Pictures of the Seven Climes) is also missing from 'Atufi's inventory. This atlas, held in the Topkapı Palace Museum Library today, carries an impression of Bayezid II's stamp.⁵ 'Atufi's omission of the cartographical works is due to the physical realities of the books in the library. The atlases were kept in the same building but catalogued separately in the Inner Treasury registers rather than in the library register.⁶

GEOGRAPHY AND GEOGRAPHIC KNOWLEDGE IN 'ATUFI'S INVENTORY

In order to better evaluate 'Atufi's classification of Wonders of Creation and Geography, an important but not absolute distinction should be made between the discipline of geography and that of geographical knowledge in the early modern period. The first term, "geography," encompasses what contemporaries understood by the discipline, its content, and textual traditions. The second term, "geographical knowledge," refers to traditions and practices wherein the geography of the world is constructed as an object of science, art, and wonder. This involves observing, mapping, collecting, comparing, and classifying—or in other words, scholarly and intellectual engagement in understanding the world's geography.⁷ From this perspective, it is clear that 'Atufi's inventory highlights what the Ottoman ruling elites and literati understood by the term "geography" and provides an impression of the extent of their geographical knowledge up to 1503.

At first glance, 'Atufi's inventory on geographical works looks haphazard to the modern educated eye. It does not seem to follow a systematic categorization or hierarchy of subjects. Although some important works of classical Islamic geography are part of the list, it appears that, beyond the copies of Qazwini's 'Ajā'ib al-Makhlūqāt, which 'Atufi lists at the beginning, the rest of the works are cited without any particular consideration as to the topic or author. For instance, the three works on Constantinople and its history are listed separately from each other, and so are two works on the wonders of India. Closer scrutiny, however, reveals that there is a certain logic behind the organization of this section.

In his introduction to the inventory, 'Atufi admits to the difficulties he faced in classifying the works. He explains why he lists the same works under different categories and points to the difficulty in determining the category under which the collected works should be placed.⁸ For instance, in the Wonders of Creation and Geography section, 'Atufi indicates thirteen geographical accounts that are bound together with other titles within historical volumes. In addition to the physical realities of the works, this may hint at the fact that the border between geography and history was still blurred in this period. As mentioned above, 'Atufi also lists a copy of Qazwini's 'Ajā'ib al-Makhlūqāt among the books on history.

There are six blank spaces scattered throughout the inventory's section on geography. One of these spaces is at the beginning, and the last one is at the end of the section. Of the remaining four, two of the blank spaces separate the books on 'Ajā'ib al-Makhlūqāt and individual works on the history of a city or region from the copies of Istakhri's Kitāb Ṣuwar al-Aqālīm (202 {10}; 202 {10–11}; 202 {11–12}; 202 {12}; 202 {13}; 202 {14}; 202 {15}; 202 {15–16}). The other two blank spaces, one at the end of page 202 and one at the beginning of page 203, separate the copies of Istakhri's Kitāb Ṣuwar al-Aqālīm from the translations of Ptolemy's Geographia (203 {5–6}; 203 {6–7}; 203 {7–9}). It is possible that 'Atufi envisioned the blank spaces as a way to create further classifications within the list. It seems that his list on Wonders of Creation and Geography contains three major subsections: Qazwini's 'Ajā'ib al-Makhlūqāt and its copies, along with individual treatises on history and cosmography; copies of Istakhri's Kitāb Ṣuwar al-Aqālīm; and translations of Ptolemy's Geographia.

It is noteworthy that 'Atufi separates the works on the Wonders of Creation and Geography from those on astronomy and practical astrology (ilm al-hay'a and ilm al-nujūm) and lists them quite far apart from each other in the inventory.⁹ In this instance, 'Atufi's classification is different from that of Katib Çelebi (d. 1657), who identifies geography as part of the science of astronomy along with hydrography, orography, and topography in the introduction to his work on world geography, Cihānnümā.¹⁰ 'Atufi, however, separates works on celestial and terrestrial knowledge, listing the works on geography immediately after the historical accounts. 'Atufi and Katib Çelebi represent two different periods in the history of geographical knowledge in the Ottoman empire. The latter was a prolific scholar who actively engaged in the science of geography and followed the contemporaneous discussions on geography very closely.¹¹ 'Atufi's separation of celestial and terrestrial knowledge complies with the more canonical stance in early sixteenth-century Ottoman intellectual circles, which treated the branches of geography and history as intimately related to each other. In this view, all of these interconnected disciplines—history, astronomy, astrology, and cosmography—were collectively put to use for scholarly and intellectual engagement in understanding the world's geography and history.

Given the fact that geography as a discipline was not part of the madrasa curricula, it should not be surprising that the number of books on this topic is much slimmer than the works on literature, religious sciences, or medicine.¹² However, even with a limited number of books, 'Atufi's inventory draws a picture of the Ottoman ruling elites' understanding of geographical knowledge and geography as a subject in the first years of the sixteenth century.

THE INVENTORY IN HISTORICAL CONTEXT

'Atufi prepared the inventory during the reign of Bayezid II. Our knowledge of this sultan's possible interest in geography is very limited. We know more about his father Mehmed II's (r. 1451–81) interest in the topic and the activities of the Ottoman intellectuals during and prior to Mehmed's reign. The earliest Ottoman examples of geographical accounts are in fact fourteenth- and fifteenth-century translations of Arabic cosmographical works.¹³ Translations of Qazwini's 'Ajā'ib al-Makhlūqāt and Ibn al-Wardi's Kharīdat al-'Ajā'ib wa-Farīdat al-Gharā'ib were among the first works on geography in the Ottoman language.¹⁴ Most well-known was Yazıcıoğlu Ahmet Bican's abridged translation of Qazwini's 'Ajā'ib al-Makhlūqāt. Yazıcıoğlu also wrote the Dürr-i Mecnūn (Well-Preserved Pearl), which is an example of a small cosmography and geography in the style of Pearls of Marvels—that is, a treatment of the Wonders of Creation.¹⁵

It was during the reign of Mehmed II, who himself collected and drew maps, that geographical accounts increasingly circulated in Istanbul. While it is well known that Mehmed II was fascinated with geographical works—especially with maps—it is difficult to determine just how aware he was of the latest developments in geography.¹⁶ Mehmed's conquest of Constantinople in 1453 intensified the Ottomans' contact with a new group of people who had a variety of political, religious, and intellectual traditions, which the Ottomans eventually adopted in the formulation of their own imperial ideology. Soon after the conquest, Mehmed II launched an architectural, social, and political campaign to change the outlook of Constantinople. Geographical works played a vital role in this enterprise.¹⁷

Mehmed II sponsored the production of maps and geographical accounts for two distinct but interrelated reasons: to satisfy his intellectual curiosity about the world, and to acquire symbolic and practical assistance in his endeavor to establish a new empire. Mehmed II's library in the Topkapı Palace housed two copies of Ptolemy's Geographia in Greek.¹⁸ According to Karen Pinto, Mehmed took a great interest in one of these manuscripts and spent long hours working on it with his friend, George Amiroutzes.¹⁹ After the conquest, this sultan commissioned the Byzantine polymath and geographer, George Amiroutzes of Trebizond, to compile all the regional maps of the Geographia into a single world map, and encouraged him and his son to prepare a new Arabic translation of the work.²⁰ While the Greek humanist scholar George of Trebizond (d. 1472 or 1473) prepared a Latin translation of Ptolemy's Almagest for Mehmed II, the Florentine scholar Francesco Berlinghieri (d. 1501) decided to dedicate a copy of his treatise on the Geographia to the same sultan. The printing of the work was completed in 1482, a year after Mehmed II died; thus, the treatise entered the Topkapı Palace Library during the reign of his son, Bayezid II.²¹ The work consisted of the standard Ptolemaic maps, four additional maps of Italy, Spain, France, and Palestine, and a commentary in verse.²² In 1479, Mehmed II had commissioned the Venetian painter, Gentile Bellini, to prepare his portrait in the contemporary European Renaissance style and to prepare a map of Venice.²³ We know today that the sultan also possessed a map of the Balkans and personally sketched the walls of Constantinople before the conquest of the city.²⁴

Mehmed II appreciated cartography and understood the ways in which maps could be used to support his political ambitions. He was aware of the prestige attached to the ownership of maps, and also of the practical value of maps in his future conquests. His library included classical works of geography and cosmography, as well as new cartographical productions. He actively commissioned maps and accepted them as gifts from his rivals in the East and West. Istakhri's Kitāb Ṣuwar al-Aqālīm reflects the intellectual cosmopolitanism of Mehmed's reign. Istakhri was a tenth-century Muslim geographer and possibly a member of the Balkhi school of geography, which flourished in tenth-century Baghdad under the patronage of the Abbasid court.²⁵ This geographical treatise on the topography of the Muslim world became very popular among Muslim scholars, and many copies and translations of it circulated in the Islamic world starting in the eleventh century. An Aqqoyunlu copy of the work reached Istanbul when it was perhaps gifted to Mehmed II by Uzun Hasan (d. 1478), who ruled Iran, Iraq, and Southeastern Anatolia. Karen Pinto suggests that Uzun Hasan may have sent this manuscript to Istanbul as part of Mehmed's ransom demand for Yusuf Mirza, Uzun Hasan's nephew, who was kidnapped by Mehmed's son Prince Mustafa.²⁶ Uzun Hasan's territorial ambitions gradually became a threat to the Ottoman domains; in 1464 he sent an embassy to Venice, offering an anti-Ottoman alliance, which was welcomed. The Aqqoyunlu ruler openly displayed his rivalry, even hostility, towards the Ottoman sultan. He was, however, aware that Mehmed II valued maps and geographical works. Uzun Hasan probably wanted to take advantage of this knowledge and may have sent the work to the Ottoman sultan as a gift.²⁷

The presence of works by Ptolemy and Istakhri in Mehmed II's Topkapı Palace Library and the sultan's abiding interest in cartographical works suggest a conscious effort to return Constantinople to its former glory as a cosmopolitan center of intellectual and economic exchange. Mehmed II also collected available Byzantine treatises on Constantinople and its most precious monument, the Hagia Sophia, and commissioned their translation into Ottoman Turkish and Persian. These translations transmitted the Byzantine legends about the foundation of the city and Hagia Sophia into the Ottoman tradition, which weaved them into the Ottoman imperial ideology.²⁸ Through these works, Mehmed II aimed at shaping the image of a new empire, which he created by combining Byzantine and Muslim traditions.²⁹ Mehmed was a man of his age; he was a patron of artists and intellectuals. This, combined with the new capital and the new empire, was a legacy he left to his successors.

'Atufi's inventory includes works from Mehmed II's library and collection, and also covers the works that entered the palace library during the first half of Bayezid II's reign. Bayezid did not radically change his father's tradition of offering patronage to artists and intellectuals from the East and West. He welcomed both Italian and Persian artists and their works to his court. For instance, he attempted to commission Leonardo da Vinci and Michelangelo to work on imperial projects in Constantinople.³⁰ After the death of Mehmed II, Berlinghieri dedicated one of his printed copies of Ptolemy's Geographia to Bayezid II as mentioned above, and another to Bayezid's brother Cem, who fled to Rhodes after 1482 and was then taken by the Knights Hospitaller to France as a hostage, to be subsequently handed over to the Pope.³¹ Printed maps proliferated in Europe during this period. A vibrant map trade had begun to flourish in Florence by the beginning of the sixteenth century. While we do not know how widely these printed maps circulated in Constantinople, we do know that Berlinghieri's copy reached Constantinople during Bayezid II's reign. As is well known, the Süleymaniye Library holds two translations of Ptolemy's Geographia, each with Bayezid II's seal impressions, which were produced for his father.³²

It is difficult to determine which of the listed works entered the library during Mehmed II's tenure and which ones during Bayezid II's, as not all of them feature dedications and dated colophons. Several copies of Qazwini's 'Ajā'ib al-Makhlūqāt and Istakhri's Kitāb Şuwar al-Aqālīm can perhaps be attributed to Bayezid's interest in Islamic traditions. Bayezid II, who was known to be more devout than his father, is usually credited for reversing his father's Westernizing practices and tastes. However, as mentioned above, Bayezid patronized artists and intellectuals from the East and West. Furthermore, Mehmed II was very keen on collecting and commissioning both European and "traditional Islamic" works on geography. He was so impressed by the Aqqoyunlu copy of Istakhri's Kitāb Şuwar al-Aqālīm that he commissioned several copies of the work.³³ Another issue that further complicates this picture is the seals on the manuscripts. As suggested by Karen Pinto, Mehmed II was not in the habit of stamping the books he collected with his seal, unlike his son Bayezid II. Of the six copies of Istakhri's Kitāb Şuwar al-Aqālīm that were produced in Istanbul between 1470 and 1520, five carry Bayezid II's seals on their opening and closing folios.³⁴ Therefore, despite the fact that 'Atufi prepared his inventory during the reign of Bayezid II, the list should be considered as a collective record of what Mehmed II and Bayezid II deemed valuable as works of geography.

CONCLUSION

'Atufi's short inventory of books on Wonders of Creation and Geography draws from the major works of classical Islamic geography. These works cover a wide variety of related subjects in geography, history, cosmography, medicine, and mechanics. In general, 'Atufi's entries are very brief. In most cases, he identifies neither the authors nor the production dates for the titles listed. Therefore, it is not clear whether his list includes works produced by earlier Ottoman scholars of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Nevertheless, the list offers important clues on the ways in which the Ottoman literati understood geography and categorized geographical accounts.

The largest segment within 'Atufi's inventory is comprised of the copies of Qazwini's 'Ajā'ib al-Makhlūqāt. The librarian lists these copies at the beginning, along with a number of historical accounts. The rest of the inventory consists of mostly unidentified and seemingly generic geographical works with the exception of the copies of Ptolemy's Geographia and Istakhri's Kitāb Şuwar al-Aqālīm. We have seen that 'Atufi attempts to further divide his inventory into three subsections by leaving empty spaces between the copies of these three abovementioned works. This likely indicates that 'Atufi perceived a distinction between the cosmographical work of Qazwini, the cartographical work of Istakhri, and the translation of the mathematical geography of Ptolemy.

Furthermore, 'Atufi's organization separates the Wonders of Creation and Geography from practical astronomy and astrology, and to a lesser degree from history. 'Atufi signals the importance of geography as a separate discipline from the celestial sciences but still treats it as intimately related to the discipline of history.

Finally, 'Atufi's inventory of Bayezid II's library holdings is one of the earliest instances in which an Ottoman intellectual has described and organized the subject matter of a book collection for potential readers and researchers. 'Atufi's introduction to the inventory also reveals his eagerness to make the collection more accessible. His work provides us with a fascinating glimpse into the shifting patterns of thought regarding the discipline of geography and geographical knowledge among the Ottoman ruling elites and intellectuals. It also prepares the ground for future work by Ottoman librarians, literati, and geographers.

BOOKS ON ARABIC PHILOLOGY AND LITERATURE: A TEACHING COLLECTION FOCUSED ON RELIGIOUS LEARNING AND THE STATE CHANCERY

In the inventory of Sultan Bayezid II's palace library in Istanbul compiled by his librarian 'Atufi in 908 (1502–3), the list of texts pertaining to Arabic philology and literature includes collections of poetry, orations, proverbs, epistolary writings, works of belletrist and popular prose, and books on rhetoric, lexicography, grammar, and prosody. These texts comprise fifty-three of the inventory's 365 folios—nearly fifteen percent—indicating the importance of Arabic philology and literature to the Ottoman educational program. The question, then, is why this particular category of texts is so abundant. We can begin to approach the answer by evaluating to what purpose these copious materials were harnessed. And we can understand that purpose to some degree by assessing the strengths and character of the collection.

The contents of the Arabic philology and literature materials signal a two-pronged focus on religion and the chancery. A major portion of the poetry and prose corpus consists of Islamic, particularly Sufi, works—notably the lengthy mystical poems of Ibn al-Farid (d. 1235) and al-Busiri's (d. ca. 1294) poems in praise of the Prophet Muhammad (d. 632, madiḥ nabawī). Prominent too are collections of sayings, orations, and verse attributed to the first Shi'i imam and fourth Sunni caliph 'Ali ibn Abi Talib (d. 661). Certain other famous poets and rhymed prose writers without a particularly pietistic focus—chief among them al-Mutanabbi (d. 965) and al-Hariri (d. 1122)—are profusely represented, perhaps because they were important models for chancery officials and for teaching advanced Arabic to pages in the palace school. Also predominant are books on sciences auxiliary to both religious studies and statecraft, including grammar, lexicons, and prosody, and dictionaries of rare words (gharīb) that occur in the Qur'an and prophetic hadith, as well as books that are more specifically related to chancery work, such as those on ciphers and accounting.

The clustering of Arabic philology and literature titles in 'Atufi's inventory suggests that this was a teaching collection. With a handful of works dominating—multiple copies of a few key classical texts, plus commentaries, glosses, and superglosses on those texts, including ninety-nine copies of al-Sakkaki's (d. 1229) rhetorical manual Miftāḥ al-'ulūm (Key to the Sciences) and its commentaries—the inventory points to a readership interested in learning language-based skills from preferred commentaries on specific texts by a handful of favorite authors. Works by al-Zamakhshari (d. 1144), Ibn al-Hajib (d. 1249), al-Khatib al-Tibrizi (d. 1109), al-Jawhari (d. ca. 1003), Majd al-Din Ibn al-Athir (d. 1210), and al-Maydani (d. 1124) dominate in grammar, prosody, lexicography, rare-word (gharīb) dictionaries, and proverbs, respectively. All works listed under the rubric of philology and literature are written in formal Arabic, which also reinforces the emphasis on language teaching. A couple of texts in Middle Arabic—an intermediate register between formal and colloquial—are listed elsewhere, in the history section of the inventory. A similar curricular focus with a primarily religious (but not administrative) concern is found in the collections of late medieval Arabic manuscript libraries in India, as well as in Cairo and Damascus.¹

Listed in 'Atufi's inventory are many of the best-known works in the classical literary heritage of the Eastern Islamic world, alongside other works that are less recognized. The Western Andalusian tradition is almost completely absent, as is the early Eastern Shi'i poetic legacy. Works of rhymed and rhythmic prose are itemized, but not works of unrhymed literary prose or narrative fiction. A small but significant proportion of the materials are works by local Ottoman scholars (e.g., 213 {9–10}) and even rulers, including a treatise on jihad by Bayezid II himself (214 {15–17}). Additionally, a small number of works listed among the Arabic philological and literary materials consists of translations and commentaries in Persian and Turkish. Especially because of its focus on certain texts, the list can give us some sense of the Ottoman canon.

In what follows, I discuss the coverage and gaps in the inventory, with remarks on how these reflect the pedagogical function of the collection, particularly in the realms of religion and chancery. Next, I assess the valuable volumes and formal presentation of the collection. Finally, I list the inventory's titles in the fields of Arabic literature and philology in a list of entries.

OVERVIEW

Of the eighteen sections in 'Atufi's inventory, four deal with subjects that can be categorized directly under the rubric of Arabic literature and philology:

Section 9 (203–28): on “Arabic diwans, versified books, books of orations, books of rhymed prose, books of proverbs ... books of prosody and the science of rhyme, and poetry” (al-dawāwīn al-‘arabiyya wa-l-kutub al-manẓūma wa-kutub al-khuṭab wa-l-kutub al-musajja‘a wa-kutub al-amthāl ... wa-kutub ‘ilm al-‘arūd wa-‘ilm al-qawāfi wa-l-shi‘r). In this section, collections of poetry predominate (203–15).

The portion of section 9 that is devoted to administrative materials—correspondence, epistolary prose, accounting, and ciphers (indicated by elision marks in the title above, 218–23, and, alongside works on prosody, 225–27)—is described in a separate essay of the present volume. Sections 10 and 11, which list Persian and Turkish poetry collections, are also discussed elsewhere, along with the Turkish and Persian prosody manuals in section 9.

Section 12 (268–77): “books of rhetoric” (tafṣīl kutub al-ma‘ānī).

Section 13 (280–92): “books on the science of morphology and syntax” (tafṣīl kutub ‘ilm al-ṣarf wa-l-naḥw).

Section 14 (293–300): “books of Arabic lexicography and linguistics” (tafṣīl kutub al-lughā al-‘arabiyya), including lexicons, rare words in the Qur'an and hadith, proverbs, and linguistics. It includes some works in Persian, Ottoman Turkish, and Chaghatay (concentrated in 296–98), alongside a few titles in Greek, Latin, Serbian, Pahlavi, and “Frankish,” especially several works of Greek philosophy (296 {4, 7–8}), which are not discussed in this chapter.

The inventory lists numerous translations of works of grammar, rhetoric, lexicography, and literature into other languages, mostly Persian and some Turkish; many of these are in verse form.

In addition, section 2 on hadith contains compilations of 'Ali's maxims.

Section 6 on “Sufism” (105–49) also contains works of literary prose and poetry. It includes a few titles—such as Ibn al-Farid's poems, al-Busiri's Mantle Poem, and 'Ali's maxims—which are also listed in the section devoted to Arabic literature (section 9). Additionally, it includes a number of prose titles that are studied in contemporary academia under the umbrella of both Sufism and literature, such as Ibn al-'Arabi's (d. 1240) al-Futūḥāt al-Makkiyya (Meccan Victories) and Fuṣūṣ al-ḥikam (Bezels of Wisdom), al-Ghazali's (d. 1111) Iḥyā' 'ulūm al-dīn (Revivification of the Religious Sciences), and al-Qushayri's (d. 1074) Risāla (Treatise). In the present volume, these are assessed in the chapter on Sufism.

Section 8, “History and Biography” (175–203), comprises works of literary prose, including several copies of the translated Sanskrit-Pahlavi animal stories, Kalīla wa-Dimna (Kalila and Dimna), and the popular epic tale Qisṣat 'Antar (The Epic of 'Antar), as well as a few copies of al-Tha'alibi's (d. 1038) Thimār al-qulūb (Fruits for the Heart), al-Tanukhi's (d. 994) al-Faraj ba'd al-shidda (Deliverance from Hardship), and the collection of popular tales titled Alf layla wa-layla (A Thousand and One Nights). These medieval adab works of quasi-historical fiction usually follow the format of historical works, and this is probably the reason why the Ottoman cataloguer makes no distinction between the two categories. The adab works are briefly assessed, and their titles listed, in the present chapter.²

The final folios of section 8 also include “Mirrors for Princes,” works which may be categorized within the field of Arabic literature, as well as works that straddle the fields of geography and literary prose from the genre called “wonders” (‘ajā’ib), such as Buzurg ibn Shahriyar’s (fl. tenth century) ‘Ajā’ib al-Hind (Wonders of India). These materials are discussed elsewhere in the present volume, in the chapter on “History and Biography.”

PROMINENT TITLES: THE OTTOMAN CANON

The prominent titles of the collection convey a sense of the Ottoman canon of Arabic philology and literature at the turn of the sixteenth century. These works are categorized below by genre. Within each category, works are listed in order of the number of copies in the inventory, including texts, commentaries, and glosses.

Poetry

The Dīwān (Poetry Collection) of the poetic prodigy al-Mutanabbi is the star of the show (34 copies). Close runner-ups are the lengthy, mystical, love and wine poems of Ibn al-Farid (30 copies), and al-Busiri’s 700+ verse mystical poem in praise of the Prophet Muhammad, Qaṣīdat al-Burda (Mantle Poem, 26 copies). Also plentiful are the following collections: the Dīwān of a late Abbasid poet named al-Abiwardi (d. 1113, 10 copies); Abu Tammam’s (d. 845) thematic anthology of eloquent verse from the pre-Islamic and early Islamic period, al-Ḥamāsa (Heroism, also 10 copies); various collections of the verse of ‘Ali ibn Abi Talib (9 copies); al-Ma‘arri’s (d. 1058) Saqṭ al-zand (Fire-Stick’s Spark, also 9 copies); the pre-Islamic poetry collection called al-Mu‘allaqāt (Precious Odes, 6 copies); the Dīwān of al-Majnun (fl. seventh century, also 6 copies); Ka‘b ibn Zuhayr’s (fl. seventh century) Qaṣīdat al-Burda (Mantle Poem, precursor of al-Busiri’s poem of the same name, 5 copies); al-Shanfara’s (d. ca. 550) Lāmiyya (Poem in L, also 5 copies); and the Dīwān of Abu Nuwas (d. ca. 813, also 5 copies). The Damascene Ashrafiyya library, which was founded in the thirteenth century, also held many copies of certain poetry collections, especially Abu Tammam’s anthology and al-Mutanabbi’s Dīwān.³

Literary Prose

Orations, maxims, and the rhymed prose of the Maqāmāt (Standings) genre are the main categories of literary prose included in this section of the inventory. In the genre of rhymed prose (saj‘), the Abbasid littérateur al-Hariri’s picaresque Maqāmāt (Standings, 16 copies) is abundantly present. The portion on orations and maxims is dominated by three texts ascribed to ‘Ali ibn Abi Talib: al-Sharif al-Radi’s (d. 1016) compilation of ‘Ali’s orations, epistles, and wisdom sayings, Nahj al-balāgha (Path of Eloquence, 10 copies); the compilation attributed to al-Jahiz (d. 868), titled Ṣad kalima (One Hundred Proverbs, listed thus in its Persian title, 11 copies; the original Arabic title is Mi‘at kalima); and al-Tabrisi’s (fl. twelfth century) collection of ‘Ali’s sayings, Nathr al-la‘ālī (Scattered Pearls, 9 copies). These and other compilations of ‘Ali’s maxims (with fewer copies) are listed in section 6 on Sufism, including Ghurur al-ḥikam (Radiant Maxims), Kalimāt (Maxims), Waṣāyā (Counsel), and ‘Ahd ilā Mālik al-Ashtar (‘Ali’s Testament to Malik al-Ashtar), and in section 2 on hadith. Titles of works by classical authors that can be placed more squarely within the genre of proverbs are concentrated in section 14, and are discussed below among books on language.

As mentioned earlier, two works of fiction are prominent in section 8 on history: the translated Mirrors for Princes; the collection of animal stories, Kalīla wa-Dimna (13 copies) by Ibn al-Muqaffa’ (d. 759), which is written in a high, literary Arabic register; and the popular early epic on the pre-Islamic poet and hero ‘Antar, titled Qīṣṣat ‘Antar (6 copies), a work from an oral genre that is transcribed in Middle Arabic. These are not presented as part of the literary canon; rather, they represent important works of history for the Ottoman cataloguer.

Prosody

Three relatively obscure texts form the bulk of the works on prosody and poetics. These are al-Khatib al-Tibrizi’s (d. 1109) al-Kāfi (Absolute Sufficer, 8 copies), Rami’s (fl. fourteenth century) Anīs al-‘ushshāq (Comfort for Lovers, 8 copies), and Shams-i Fakhri’s (d. 1348) Mi‘yār-i Jamālī (Jamali Touchstone, 4 copies). Four pages of ‘Atufi’s inventory list books of Arabic prosody (225–28). This is a large number for a technical subject, and—in conjunction with the fact that poetry forms the heftiest part of the inventory’s literature chapter, section 9—it shows the importance of Arabic poetry in Ottoman culture.

Rhetoric

The main text in the field of rhetoric is al-Sakkaki's Miftāḥ al-ʿulūm (Key to the Sciences), which occupies a full 8 folios (268–76) of ʿAtufi's inventory. As mentioned earlier, the inventory lists ninety-nine copies of the Miftāḥ, including the text itself, as well as commentaries, glosses, superglosses, expansions, and abridgements. Of the eleven copies of the text, nine are of the full Miftāḥ, including all three of its sections on syntax, morphology, and rhetoric. The two other copies of the text, and all ninety glosses, are of the final section on rhetoric. Al-Sakkaki's exposition echoes ʿAbd al-Qahir al-Jurjani's (d. ca. 1078) views on rhetoric in his two field-shaping works, Asrār al-balāgha (Secrets of Rhetoric) and Dalāʾil al-iʿjāz (Proofs of Inimitability); the Asrār al-balāgha is not represented in this collection, while the Dalāʾil al-iʿjāz is present. Of the ninety glosses on the Miftāḥ's section on rhetoric, fifty-two are copies of al-Khatib al-Qazwini's (d. 1338) abridgement titled Talkhīṣ al-Miftāḥ (Abridgement of the Key), along with its own glosses. The far distant runner-up to al-Sakkaki's Miftāḥ is al-Ijī's (d. 1355) al-Fawāʾid al-Ghiyāthiyya (Ghiyath's Benefits) with five copies.

The Miftāḥ appears to be the driving force behind ʿAtufi's collection on works of Arabic rhetoric. In addition to the abundance of copies, the title of section 12 of the inventory—tafṣīl kutub al-maʿānī (Books of Rhetoric)—is itself influenced by the Miftāḥ. The term balāgha came to denote the field of stylistics in general across the Islamic world. Instead of balāgha, ʿAtufi uses another term, maʿānī, which typically signifies a subsection of the field—namely, the rhetorical aspect of syntax-driven constructs, such as elision and hysteron-proteron. The two other major subsections are bayān, which denotes imagery, and badīʿ, which denotes punning and wordplay. The Miftāḥ's section on rhetoric is made up of two of these three subsections, maʿānī and bayān, and opens with maʿānī, which is probably why ʿAtufi used the term as his chapter heading. To be sure, the terminology of Arabic rhetoric is fluid in its development, but the fact that ʿAtufi titled section 12 as “Books of maʿānī” is likely an echo of the Miftāḥ's usage, rather than pure coincidence.

Grammar

In the category of grammar, the most important texts are Ibn al-Hajib's al-Kāfiya (Absolute Sufficer, 37 copies) for syntax, and al-Shāfiya (The Comprehensive Treatise, 15 copies) for morphology. Other prominent texts for morphology are al-Zanjani's (fl. thirteenth century) ʿIzzī (ʿIzz al-Dīn's Book, 16 copies) and Ibn Masʿūd's (d. 1301) Marāḥ al-arwāḥ (Cheer for the Spirit, 7 copies).

In addition to Ibn al-Hajib's al-Kāfiya, another important work on syntax is al-Zamakhshari's al-Mufaṣṣal (The Explicated Text, 28 copies). Other titles on syntax include al-Baydawi's (d. ca. 1286) Lubāb al-albāb (The Essence of Minds, 12 copies), Sibawayh's (d. ca. 796) Kitāb (The Book, 8 copies), al-Farisi's (d. 987) al-Īdāḥ (The Elucidator) and al-ʿAwāmil (Grammatical Agents, 6 copies each), al-Mutarrizi's (d. 1213) al-Miṣbāḥ (Lamp, 5 copies), Ibn Malik's (d. 1274) al-Alfiyya (Thousand Verse Poem), al-Yamani's (d. 1281) al-Mughnī (The Sufficing Text, 4 copies each), and Ibn al-Ḥajib's al-Wāfiya (The Fulfiller, 3 copies).

Lexicons and Proverbs

In Arabic-to-Arabic lexicography, the main texts are al-Jawhari's (d. ca. 1003) Tāj al-lughā (Crown of Lexicography, 13 copies) and al-Zamakhshari's Muqaddimat al-adab (Introduction to Literature, 11 copies). The most important lexicon devoted to explicating rare words (gharīb) from the Qurʾān and hadith is Majd al-Dīn Ibn al-Athir's (d. 1210) al-Nihāya (The Ultimate Book, 5 copies). For proverbs, the main text is al-Maydani's Majmaʿ al-amthāl (Collection of Proverbs, 6 copies).

TITLES WITH FEWER COPIES: BEYOND THE CANON

In addition to the titles represented in many copies that likely formed part of the Ottoman teaching curriculum, the inventory lists other works in single or few copies that were probably of secondary importance. These materials may have been used for reference by scholars who had already gone through the regular course of study. By taking a look at these titles, we can flesh out the Arabic literary and philological territory that was known to the Ottomans. The titles that appear in the categories below are listed in chronological order according to the death dates of their authors, with page numbers.

Poetry

‘Atufi’s inventory lists several diwans (poetry collections) by individuals, or anthologies of the verse of multiple poets, with one to three copies of each title (205–7). Among the collections of individual poets, several are famous—such as Zuhayr (d. 609), al-Mutalammis (fl. sixth century), al-Nabigha (fl. sixth century), and al-Khirqi (d. ca. 600) from the pre-Islamic period; al-Hutay’a (fl. seventh century) and Hassan ibn Thabit (d. ca. 661) from the early Islamic period; al-Farazdaq (d. 728) from the Umayyad period; and Abu Tammam and al-Buhturi (d. 897) from the Abbasid period. Poets with moderate or faint renown include the pre-Islamic poets Qutba ibn Aws al-Hadira (fl. sixth century) and Laqit al-Iyadi (fl. sixth century), and the early Islamic poet Abu Mihjan al-Thaqafi (d. ca. 637). Additional poets of modest repute from the Abbasid period include those who composed directly under the Abbasids, or under the rule of the Buyids, Saljuks, Ayyubids, Mamluks, Zangids, and other local dynasties—Abu Hayya al-Numayri (d. between 760 and 825), the royal consort Fadl (d. 871), Sari’ al-Dila (d. 1021), al-Raffa’ (d. 1153), Watwat (d. 1182), Ibn al-Ta’awidhi (d. 1188), Ibn al-Sa’ati (d. 1207), Ibn al-Nabih (d. 1222), Shams-i Tabasi (d. ca. 1227), Ibn ‘Unayn (d. 1233), and al-Baha’ Zuhayr (d. 1258). Three are poets of the post-Abbasid period—Nizam al-Din al-Isfahani (d. 1278), Safi al-Din al-Hilli (d. ca. 1349), and Ibn Makanis (d. 1392). Some poetry collections are by local Ottoman poets, including al-Halimi (fl. fifteenth century), and others whose identities remain obscure, including one named Shams al-Afadil Badr al-Din.

Among the large number of poetry and prose anthologies in ‘Atufi’s inventory, most are represented in single copies (213–15). Several of these are works compiled by well-known scholars, including Ibn ‘Abd Rabbih’s (d. 940) al-‘Iqd al-farīd (Unique String of Pearls), Abu Hilal al-‘Askari’s (d. ca. 1005) thematic anthology titled Dīwān al-Ma‘ānī (Collection of Thematic Units), and three by al-Tha’alibi—Yatīmat al-dahr (Pearl of the Age), Rawḥ al-rūḥ (Solace for the Soul), and Ṭarā’if al-ṭuraf (Exquisite Rarities). Selections from individual poets include excerpted volumes of the Dīwān of al-Sharīf al-Radi, and of two lesser known poets, al-Bakharzi (d. 1075) and al-‘Ubaydi (fl. fourteenth century). I have not been able to identify authors for fourteen other anthologies (213–15).

The poetry anthology portion segues into versified books on various subjects such as grammar, philosophy, mirrors for princes, and prayer, with a few additional anthologies mixed in (214–15, 217). These include proof-texts from Sibawayh’s grammar, a verse rendering of the Kalila and Dimna tales, and an amulet inscription. Another is a work titled Naẓm ādāb al-baḥth (Versification of the Etiquette of Research) by a recently deceased Ottoman noble referred to by the epithet Khusraw. Yet another is a poem by “Ibn al-‘Ibrī” (Son of the Hebrew)—perhaps Bar Hebraeus (d. 1286)—“in Syriac script, interleaved with Arabic.” With the exception of Sharḥ Qaṣīdat Ibn Sīnā (Commentary on the Poem of Ibn Sina), which has three copies, these works are in single copies. Versified books are also listed in section 14, where they are bound together with works on language (298).

A handful of titles in the poetry section are prefaced with the word Risāla (Treatise, 214–15), which is unusual. Their categorization as poetry suggests they are in verse form, but this is not a firm indicator. Among the treatises in this section are Risālat Sulṭān al-salāṭīn Sulṭān Bāyazīd Khān (Treatise of the Sultan of Sultans, Sultan Bayezid Khan) on jihad, Risālat al-Imām al-Rāzī (Imam al-Razi’s Treatise) on wise counsel, and an anonymous work titled Risālat qawā’id lughat al-furs (Treatise on Rules of the Language of the Persians); these three works were probably written by Ottoman scholars.

Literary Prose

The inventory lists several literary prose works with one or two copies each. The portion on rhymed prose in section 9 includes the volume of picaresque tales titled Maqāmāt (Standings) by Badi’ al-Zaman (d. 1008, 218 {1–2}), the founder of the genre and al-Hariri’s precursor; in this portion, there are no additional titles of rhymed or unrhymed prose works. Section 9’s chancery segment lists the orations of Ibn Nubata (d. 985, 218 {9}). Section 8 on history includes works of classical adab, as well as annotated selections of prose and poetry, such as al-Tanukhi's al-Faraj ba'd al-shidda (Deliverance from Hardship, 192) and al-Tha'alibi's Thimār al-qulūb (Fruits for the Heart, 192). It also lists the collection of popular tales, Alf layla wa-layla (A Thousand and One Nights, 192), as well as anonymous works in the genre of literary debate (munāzara) between the pen and the sword, reason and passion, and fasting and breaking fast (194). Among the relevant literary prose titles listed in section 6 on Sufism are two works by al-Zamakhshari, Rabī' al-abrār (Springtime for the Pious, 144) and Aṭwāq al-dhahab (Collars of Gold, 129, 147). Also listed there are single copies of commentaries on maxims attributed to the three Sunni caliphs, Abu Bakr, 'Umar, and 'Uthman (137 {1–3}). Many additional Sufi works are listed that may also be studied under the rubric of literature; in the present volume, these are discussed in the essay on Sufism.

Prosody

Single copies are listed of several prosody handbooks (226–28) by well-known authors, including al-Zamakhshari's al-Qusṭās (Scale), Ibn al-Hajib's al-'Arūd (Prosody), al-Tusi's (d. 1274) Mi'yār (Touchstone), and Rashid al-Din Watwat's Abkār al-afkār (Virgin Thoughts). Others by lesser known authors include Abu l-Jaysh al-Andalusi's (d. 1228) primer, for which no title is provided, Shams-i Qays's (fl. first half of thirteenth century) al-Mu'jam (Concordance), Rami's (fl. fourteenth century) Ḥaqā'iq al-ḥadā'iq (Truths from the Gardens), al-Sawī's (d. 1454) Lāmiyya (Poem in L), al-Shirwani's (fl. 1487), al-Shāfiyya (Comprehensive Treatise), and Ibn al-Janzi's al-Dawā'ir (Circles). Yet others are single copies of prosody works whose authors I have not been able to identify, including the treatise of a "Taj-i Halwani," and a work titled Shifā' al-'alīl (Cure for the Sick). Two versified prosody works are listed without a title or author's name in section 14, where they are bound together with other works (297 {12–13}).

Rhetoric

Apart from a large number of copies of al-Sakkaki's Miftāḥ (Key) and al-Ijī's al-Fawā'id (Benefits) mentioned earlier, the remainder of works on rhetoric are relegated to a mere half folio (277) of its five-folio section; these comprise single copies of three well-known texts by famous classical authors: Diya' al-Din Ibn al-Athir's (d. 1239) al-Mathal al-sā'ir (The Popular Proverb), and two that focus on the "inimitability" (ijāz) of the Qur'an—'Abd al-Qahir al-Jurjani's Dalā'il al-ijāz (Proofs of Inimitability) and Fakhr al-Din al-Razi's (d. 1209) Nihāyat al-ijāz fī dirāyat al-ijāz (The Ultimate in Succinctness on Understanding Inimitability). Three titles appear to be commentaries on an unnamed rhetoric text by a recent Ottoman scholar named Mawlana al-Kirmasti.

Earlier, the portion on prosody and cipher in section 9 lists two titles on badī' (rhetorical tropes): a commentary on Safi al-Din al-Hilli's Qaṣīda Badī'yya (Poem on the Crafts of Wordplay, 225 {8}, 228 {4–5}), and Ibn Qurqmas's (d. ca. 1478) Zahr al-rabī' (Spring Flowers, 227 {3}) on the prooftexts of rhetorical wordplay.

Grammar

Morphology titles with single copies (scattered throughout 280, 282, 290, and 292) include commentaries on al-Mazini's (d. ca. 863) al-Taṣrīf (Morphology), Ibn Jinni's al-Mulūkī (Royal Book), and the morphology section from al-Sakkaki's Miftāḥ (Key). A handful of titles with a single copy each are by authors whom I have not been able to identify; one title on Arabic morphology is written in Persian.

For syntax (290–91), al-Zajjaji's (d. ca. 948) primer, al-Jumal (Summaries), is listed in a single copy, as are Ibn Jinni's (d. 1002) al-Luma' (Flashes), al-Zamakhshari's al-Aḥājī al-naḥwīyya (Grammar Puzzles), Ibn al-Anbari's (d. 1181) Asrār al-'arabiyya (Secrets of the Arabic Language), Ibn Malik's Tashīl al-fawā'id (Making Learning Easy), and Ibn Hisham's (d. 1360) Qawā'id al-i'rāb (Rules of Parsing). Other less famous authors are Ibn Babashadh (d. 1077), al-Ijī (d. 1355), and al-Sayyid al-Sharif al-Jurjani (d. 1371). There are a handful of additional syntax works that I have been unable to identify.

Lexicons and Proverbs

Arabic-to-Arabic lexicons with a few copies are found scattered throughout the portion on language books (293–99). Lexicons by famous authors include al-Khalil's (d. 791) Kitāb al-'Ayn (Book Titled by the Letter 'Ayn), Ibn al-Faris's (d. 1004) al-Mujmal (The Compact Book), al-Tha'alibi's Fiqh al-lughā (The Science of Language), al-Zamakhshari's Asās al-balāgha (Foundation of Rhetoric), Ibn Manzur's (d. 1312) Lisān al-'Arab (The Speech of the Arabs), and al-Firuzabadi's (d. 1415) al-Qāmūs al-muḥīṭ (The Encompassing Ocean). Other philological titles—which we would perhaps categorize under literature or literary criticism—include Ibn Qutayba's (d. 889) Adab al-kātib (The Chancery Secretary's Handbook) and Ishaq ibn Ibrahim al-Farabi's (d. 961) Dīwān al-adab (The Collection of Literature). An intersection between medicine and language comes in the form of an anonymous text titled Asmā' al-adwiya al-ṭibbiya (Names of Medicinal Drugs), with 'Atufi specifying that it is "about language."⁴ A handful of lexicons are by unnamed authors whom I have not been able to identify.

Rare-word dictionaries (scattered in 295–300) include the following: for the Qur'an, works by al-Sijistani (d. 929), Ibn Qudama al-Maqdisi (d. 1223), and Najm al-Din Razi Daya (d. 1256); for the hadith, al-Zamakhshari's al-Fā'iqa (The Superior Work) and al-Mutarrizi's al-Mughrib (Prompt to Wonderment); and for both Qur'an and hadith together, al-Harawi's (d. 1010) al-Gharibayn (The Two Rare Word Categories). There are a handful of additional titles whose authors I have not been able to identify.

Titles on miscellaneous language-related genres in this section (294, 299–300) include al-Sahib Ibn 'Abbad's (d. 995) al-Farq bayn al-dād wa-l-zā' (The Difference between the Letters Z and D), Ibn Farighun's (fl. tenth century) Jawāmi' al-'ulūm (Encyclopedia of the Sciences), and al-Tustari's al-Mudhakkar wa-l-mu'annath (Masculine and Feminine). Anonymous works whose authors I have been unable to identify include al-Tuhfa (The Gift), Majma' al-bihār (Meeting of the Seas), Risāla fi aḥkām lafẓat kull (Treatise on the Rules of the Word kull [each/every/all]), Uqūd al-zawāhir (Flower Garlands) on language, derivations, and morphology, Sharḥ al-Asmā' al-ḥusnā (Commentary on [God's] Beautiful Names), Qaṣīda mumayyiza li-l-zā' min al-dād (Poem Distinguishing the Letter Z from the Letter D), and a book elucidating the principles of Arabic and religion.

Arabic-Persian dictionaries and glosses (294–95) include Zawzani's (d. 1093) al-Maṣādir (Sources), al-Maydani's al-Sāmī fi l-asāmī (The Lofty Work), Bayhaqi's (d. 1150) Tāj al-maṣādir (Crown of Sources), al-Nasafi's

(d. 1251) al-Ṣaḥīfa al-'adhrā' (The Virgin Text), Ibn Nusra's (fl. 1439) al-Tarjumān (The Translator), and Zaki's Ḥadīqat al-adab (Garden of Literature). A Persian-Arabic dictionary is al-Tiflisi's (fl. 1203) Qānūn al-adab (The Literary Rule).

For proverbs, the inventory has a single copy of Ibn al-Anbari's (d. 940) al-Zāhir fi ma'ānī kalimāt al-nās (The Shining Book on the Meanings of People's Sayings) and Hamza al-Isfahani's (d. after 961) al-Durra al-fākhira (Precious Pearl); the latter is bound together with al-Maydani's proverb collection.

GAPS IN COVERAGE

Besides assessing the strengths of the collection, it is also interesting to note what is missing. Certainly, some lacunae are likely due to happenstance. But in the case of other, more consistent gaps, the nature of the particular lacunae could signal ideological, political, and other forces bearing upon the assembly of this collection. Some of the gaps—such as Shi'i poetry—appear to stem from sectarian and political factors, with the rivalry between the Sunni Ottomans and the Shi'i Safavids playing an obvious role. Other omissions—like the Sufi poetry collection of Ibn al-'Arabi—may be accounted for by lack of access or knowledge. Yet others, and this may be the case for many of the exclusions, could be due to their lack of relevance to the Ottoman religious and administrative teaching agenda.

Below I provide an assessment of the gaps in the Arabic literature and philology collection, along with a cursory evaluation of possible reasons for these omissions, assessed from the perspective of discipline, gender, region, and language register.

From a disciplinary lens, the major gaps are as follows:

- In poetry, the early and medieval Shi'i diwans—al-Kumayt's (d. 743) Hāshimiyyāt (Poems on the Hashimites), al-Sayyid al-Himyari's (d. ca. 789) various poems, and Ibn Abi l-Hadid's (d. 1258) 'Alawiyyāt (Poems on the 'Alawites)—are not included, nor are any of the Fatimid poets, Ibn Hani' (d. 973), Amir Tamim (d. 985), al-Mu'ayyad al-Shirazi (d. 1078), or 'Umara al-Yamani (d. 1174). This lacuna may be explained by the Ottoman-Safavid rivalry playing out largely along Sunni-Shi'i lines. But 'Ali's own sermons and sayings, as well as his poetry, are prominent in the collection, signaling that these were considered part of an authentic Sunni heritage.

It is harder to understand why several important non-sectarian poetic collections are also absent. Except for a copy of the Dīwān of al-Farazdaq (who reportedly maintained Shi'i sympathies but wrote mostly non-denominational verse, d. ca. 728), the most significant Umayyad poets—including al-Akhtal (d. before 710), 'Umar ibn Abi Rabi'a (d. ca. 712), Jarir (d. 728), and the caliph al-Walid (d. 744)—are absent from the roster. Abbasid poets are generally well represented, but some of their major composers—including Bashshar (d. 784) and Abu l-'Atahiya (d. 825)—are inexplicably missing. The pre-Islamic period too is covered relatively well, but important early anthologies of pre-Islamic poetry, such as al-Aṣma'īyyāt (al-Aṣma'i's Collection) and al-Mufaḍḍaliyyāt (Mufaḍḍal's Collection), are absent. These specific gaps could be accidental. Or, it could be that some of these poets were not considered exemplars of the Arabic language in the same way that al-Mutanabbi was, for example, and thus did not serve the pedagogical purposes of the collection. Andalusian poetry is also completely absent; more on that below.

- In prose, most of the chief adab works are strikingly absent, including those by al-Jahiz (d. 869), Abu Hayyan al-Tawhidi (d. 1023), and al-Ma'arri (although his poetry collection is present in several copies). Only the rhythmic genre of early orations and the rhymed genre of Maqāmāt are included within section 9's list of prose titles. It appears that, in the Ottoman view, what constituted beautiful Arabic literary prose was limited to pieces that were rhymed and rhythmic—and the adab works were neither. Moreover, as I mentioned earlier, Kalila and Dimna, the Epic of 'Antar, and the few other texts of non-rhymed, non-rhythmic prose listed in section 8 on history are included because of their quasi-historical formal features. Since the omitted adab works did not fit that bill, either, they fell through the cracks.

- In the section on rhetoric, early works of criticism and poetics—such as Ibn Sallam's (d. 845) Ṭabaqāt fuḥūl al-shu'arā' (Rankings of the Best Poets), Ibn Qutayba's al-Shi'r wa-l-shu'arā' (Poetry and Poets), and Qudama b. Ja'far's (d. ca. 932) Naqd al-shi'r (As-saying Poetry)—are absent. This lacuna likely stems from the fact that the section is dominated by later medieval textbooks on rhetoric. The earlier, foundational works for the genre do not represent the final fruit of the discipline, and were thus perhaps considered irrelevant to the teaching purpose of the collection. Ibn Qutayba's Adab al-Kātib (Chancery Secretary's Handbook), is included, however, among books of language in section 14.

- In the section on grammar and lexicography, most of the major classical works are present.

In terms of gender, the collection reflects the larger corpus of classical Arabic literature and philology, which is almost totally male-dominated. However, works by the few females who engaged in the poetic sphere—such as the famous pre-Islamic poet al-Khansa' (d. 634) and the Umayyad Layla al-Akhyaliyya (fl. eighth century)—are also absent. This could be due to a lack of access or knowledge, or perhaps like some important male poets who are also omitted, they were not considered exemplars of the language. There appear to be just three works listed in the inventory that were written by women: the Dīwān of the pre-Islamic elegist al-Khirmiqa bint Badr (d. ca. 600), the Dīwān of the Abbasid caliph al-Mutawakkil's consort Fadl (d. 871), and an anthology of women's verse titled Majmū'at ash'ār al-nisā' al-makhṣūṣa (Compendium of Selected Women's Verses).

In terms of region, works of the Islamic East largely predominate. Andalusian and North African works seem to be almost completely absent in all literary and philological disciplines, including the major poetic collections of Ibn Zaydun (d. 1070) and Ibn Khafaja (d. 1139). Also missing are collections of the stanzaic, part-colloquial Andalusian muwashshaḥ and zajal verse, as well as the anthologies of al-Qali (d. 967) and Ibn Bassam (d. 1147), the prose writings of Ibn Shuhayd (d. 1035) and Ibn Ḥazm (d. 1064), and the poetics of Hazim al-Qartajanni (d. 1285). Again, the lacuna could be due to a lack of access or knowledge about these authors, or it could be an indication that they were not deemed suitable exemplars of the Arabic language for the purposes of this teaching collection. Certainly, the colloquial poetry might have been ruled out on these grounds alone.

The Sufi poetry of the Andalusian mystic Ibn al-ʿArabi is also missing. This is surprising, given the collection's strength in Sufi works, and the fact that the inventory includes his prose works. Perhaps in this case, the lacuna is simply due to a lack of access or knowledge.

Of the only two Andalusian authors listed, one is a lesser known scholar named Abu al-Jaysh Muhammad ibn al-Husayn al-Andalusi, and his book on prosody is flagged merely by geographical affiliation, without the author's full name, as "the work of the Andalusian" (282 {8–9}). The other Andalusian listed is the eminent littérateur Ibn ʿAbd Rabbih. As mentioned earlier, one copy of his multi-volume anthology of prose and poetry, al-Iqd al-farid (The Unique String of Pearls), is listed among the chancery works (223 {14–19}, 224 {1–9}).

In terms of language register, only works of formal, classical Arabic—which form the backbone of the traditional heritage—are represented in the sections on literature and philology. Works in dialect clearly would not have suited the pedagogical purposes of the collection. But titles in Middle Arabic or local dialects that are absent from these sections are found elsewhere in ʿAtufi's inventory, such as the Thousand and One Nights (192 {11–12}) and the ʿAntar epic (188 {3–7}), both in Middle Arabic, which are listed in the history section. As mentioned earlier, for ʿAtufi these represent works of history, rather than proper Arabic, and thus a separate rationale is attached to their inclusion elsewhere.

VALUABLE VOLUMES

The collection boasts a number of valuable volumes. Three autograph copies by Ottoman scholars are listed: the late-fifteenth-century Ottoman scholar Lutfullah al-Halimi's Kitāb Durar (Book of Pearls, 297 {8–9}), al-Shirwani's prosody volume al-Shāfiya (The Comprehensive Treatise, 226 {5}), and Tafsīr Gharīb al-Qurʾān (Exegesis of the Rare Words of the Qurʾān, 298 {5–6}) by someone named Abu Bakr al-Razi (perhaps Najm al-Din Razi Daya, d. 1256), are said to be "in the author's handwriting" (bi-khaṭṭi muʿallifihi, or bi-khaṭṭihi).⁵

A handful of volumes of poetry and rhymed prose were copied by eminent scribes known for their beautiful penmanship: Ahmad ibn al-Suhrawardi al-Bakri (active ca. 1290) is named as the copyist for Badiʿ al-Zaman's (d. 1008) Maqāmāt (218 {1–2}). Yaqt al-Mustaʿsimi (d. 1298) is named as the copyist for four volumes: *Muntakhab Dīwān al-Mutanabbī*⁶ (Selections from the Dīwān of al-Mutanabbi, 204 {13–14}), the Dīwāns of Qutba ibn Aws and Abu Mihjan al-Thaqafi, 207 {2–3}), and an anonymous anthology titled Muntakhab min al-ashʿār wa-l-āthār (Selections of Verses and Remnants, 213 {7–8}). Al-Mustaʿsimi's student Arghun al-Kamili (d. 1343) is named as the copyist for al-Shanfara's Lāmiyya (212 {14–15}).

An illustrated copy of Ibn al-Muqaffa's Kalīla and Dimna tales (189 {10})⁷, and a copy of the Epic of ʿAntar, described as "deluxe" (fākhīr),⁸ also appear to be special copies.

FORMAL PRESENTATION

The inventory's formal presentation supports the notion of a teaching collection. Four observations are in order:

First, the titles with the most copies are usually listed first or early on in every section. These are usually followed by blank spaces of a quarter to half a page, presumably for filling in titles of related works or copies as they enter the collection. The fact that these spaces usually follow titles already represented in numerous copies signals a priority for gathering additional copies of intensively used works, rather than acquiring new works. The same popular titles are listed unsystematically in other places as well. These copies may have been acquired later, and were thus recorded later on in the inventory.

Second, multiple miscellaneous works are often bound together in a single volume. For example, bound together in a single manuscript with a work of prosody are titles on rhetoric, letters, accounting, Persian dictionaries, and books discussing the difference between the letters Ẓ and Ḍ. It would be worthwhile to explore the rationale behind certain titles being bound together.

Third, although there does not appear to be a significant overlap between titles in our literature and philology section, on the one hand, and other sections of the inventory, on the other, there are a few texts that 'Atufi has apparently found difficult to pigeonhole into a single, neat slot. An example is 'Ali's sermons and maxims, which are listed mostly in section 9 on literature, but also appear in the sections on Sufism and history. Similarly, Ibn al-Farid's poems are listed both in literature and in Sufism. In addition to interdisciplinary overlap, there is also some overlap within the sections dedicated to literature and philology. Proverb collections, for example, are listed both in section 9 on literature and in section 14 on language; though most of these are deemed philological reference works and are therefore listed as language titles, which supports the thesis that 'Atufi's inventory represents a teaching collection focused on imparting proper language skills for the chancery and for religious study.

One final observation, which is important to bear in mind when perusing the concluding list of entries, is that 'Atufi's inventory is extremely cryptic. In many cases, he lists books only by author and genre, without giving the actual title of the work. At other times, he records only titles (often partial) without naming the author, or provides only a description of a book. In my list of entries, I have filled in missing author names or book titles as far as I could ascertain.⁹ I then compared this preliminary information to the list of Topkapı Palace Museum Library (TSMK) manuscripts that bear impressions of Bayezid II's seals. Those entries that I have not been able to identify are listed here as they appear in 'Atufi's inventory. It is my hope that other scholars might be able to determine their authorship.

NOTES

Author's note: This work represents a warm tribute to my Doktorvater, Professor Wolfhart Heinrichs, who passed away in 2014. I am honored to take up the baton for this essay, which he was originally slated to write. My sincere thanks to Professor Geert Jan van Gelder for his generous and expert help in identifying several of the works listed in the entries on Arabic philology and literature.

The following pages contain a full list of the Arabic philology and literature books in ʿAtufi's inventory. The listing follows the content and classification of the inventory's four sections (9, 12, 13, and 14) on Literature, Rhetoric, Grammar, and Lexicography. The few additional prose titles listed here under "Literature" are culled from the inventory's two related sections (6 and 8) on Sufism and History. Within the four sections, titles are listed roughly in the order in which they appear, with scattered copies listed in later pages brought forward. In each section, works by the same author and their commentaries are clustered, with the author's name in uppercase. Titles from the same subgenre, such as anthologies, are also clustered. A line space separates the clusters.

Each listing contains the name of the author, his death date, and the title of the book in Arabic (with its English translation in parentheses). Also mentioned are the page and line number on which the title appears in ʿAtufi's inventory, the number of its copies, and any known impressions of Sultan Bayezid II's seals. From time to time, one or two lines describe the contents of a title or the language of the work.

Some of the information on author names and book titles is taken directly from the inventory, and some information has been added by me. My method and sources for identifying details of cited works are described in the last part of my essay in the present volume.

This title is repeated in the section on Sufism, 112 {3–4}, 1 copy. An annotation above the first listing says this work

NOTES

1. Alternatively, “Abū l-Ḥasan” could be Muḥammad b. Aḥmad al-Maghribī (fl. tenth century), or Aḥmad b. ‘Alī al-Battī (fl. early tenth century).
2. The first written compilation is tentatively attributed to Abū Zayd al-Qurashī (fl. late ninth century) in his anthology Jamharat ash’ār al-‘arab (Collection of the Poems of the Arabs).
3. Only one copy is listed by ‘Atufi, yet two volumes of this work in the Topkapı Palace Museum Library have Bayezid II’s seals.
4. Ḥājji Khalifa, Kashf, col. 106, lists Aṣḍāf al-durar wa-akmām al-zahr (Book of Shells Covering Pearls and Calyxes of Flowers) on adab in multiple volumes, but he too does not mention an author.
5. The section on chancery and coding materials—mainly writing and accounting manuals, and collections of letters (218–22), as well as cipher works (225–27, alongside prosody)—is not covered in the present essay.
6. Several authors wrote debates between the sword and the pen, and this text could be by any one of them: Ibn al-Wardī (d. 1349), Ibn Nubāta (d. 1366), al-Qalqashandī (d. 1418), or Ibn Burd (d. 1027, less likely, for he was from al-Andalus, and very few works are attested from there in the collection). For details, see Geert Jan van Gelder, “The Conceit of Pen and Sword: On an Arabic Literary Debate,” Journal of Semitic Studies 32, no. 2 (1987): 329–60.
7. A few more titles on syntax are listed as bound with other titles in the section on books of language, which I have incorporated in the list of grammar texts above.
8. This may be the book listing synonyms written in order to explain the meaning of the different names given to drugs by Maimonides (d. 1204), titled Sharḥ Asmā’ al-‘aqqār (Commentary on the Names of Drugs).

AN OTTOMAN ORDER OF PERSIAN VERSE

In 1485, the Timurid poet and mystic Jami (d. 1492), who resided in Herat, finished his Silsilat al-dhahab (Chain of Gold), a didactic mathnawī in three parts, the last of which was dedicated to Bayezid II (r. 1481–1512). The dedication ought not be surprising, since Bayezid II had previously initiated a correspondence with Jami and lavished upon him not only praise but also gifts, including a thousand florins. In a letter to Jami dispatched after 1485 alongside another thousand florins, Bayezid II expresses deep gratitude to Jami for the copy of his Kullīyyāt (Complete Works) that he had sent as a gesture of appreciation and that must have contained the Silsila. Of Jami's gift, Bayezid II writes:

Especially, these joyful days occasioned the Kullīyyāt, bearing the scent of blessed breath and the fruit of fresh thought. It is a compendium of words, of couplets firm in footing as the base of the Ka'ba, of brilliant jewels of verse strung together like the necklaces of perfect houris, of faint pearls of meaning as found in al-Lu'lu' al-manthūr (Scattered Pearls). It is of everlasting inspiration, with guidance from the hidden and pure world, and has reached the written realm, with an ambergris-tipped pen transcribing the eloquent speech. ... It has now arrived at our throne, the abode of the caliphate. We got ahold of it and read it. The advice and sermons therein were pleasing to the ear, for there was much to approve and make use of.¹

Bayezid II, of course, was not alone in his high regard for Jami, nor was he the first Ottoman sultan to convey gifts regularly in an attempt to attract the poet to his court. A dozen years earlier, his father Mehmed II (r. 1451–81) had extended an invitation for Jami to join him in Istanbul when the poet was traveling in Syria on his return from the pilgrimage.² The offer was not accepted, and Jami continued to reside in Herat. Nonetheless, Mehmed

II began the practice of sending Jami a thousand florins on an annual basis. Perhaps more noteworthy, Mehmed II also received books from Jami, such as an early version of his divan and a short treatise on matters of doctrine, the latter of which was commissioned.³ These books by Jami, including the Kullīyyāt, were no doubt promptly incorporated into the Topkapı Palace Library.

The respect paid to Jami, in words and in cash, points to the Ottoman court's keen interest in Persian literature, chiefly works in verse. By the same token, the receipt of books from Jami exemplifies the means by which Persian works typically entered the Topkapı Library—that is, through gift-giving and commission. Another important means of acquisition was the annexation of private book collections that were confiscated upon the death of the owner. We may add here, too, the books seized as spoils of war, especially after the Battle of Chaldiran in 1514. All this has been amply documented, as has the court's preoccupation with literary trends taking place to the east, particularly in Herat. Yet given the indiscriminate way in which Persian works were acquired, and in ever-increasing numbers, it is nearly impossible to assess the extent to which the personal collecting preferences, if not reading tastes per se, of Mehmed II or Bayezid II may have informed the acquisitions process—aside from instances in which works were procured through the court's direct patronage or purchase.⁴

While the inventory of 1502–3 may not shed light on whether or not there was any specific acquisitions policy, it is a unique record that offers us an opportunity to examine whether the books listed in a single section reveal some sense of order. The section devoted to Persian literature, or poetry, to be more exact, consists of approximately six hundred volumes. The arrangement of the entries suggests that there is indeed a logic behind it, though that logic was not always consistently applied. The extent to which the logical arrangement can be attributed to the inventory's compiler, 'Atufi, is open to question, since from what we know of his background, he was not expert in either Persian or poetry.⁵ It seems likely, then, that 'Atufi had assistance in arranging the entries. It is possible that 'Atufi was aided by one of the many poets who had come from Herat to Istanbul to obtain new patronage and who also happened to be familiar with Jami's oeuvre, which heavily referenced the literary past, reflecting an "effort to codify and consolidate," to quote Paul Losensky.⁶ A similar concern, it appears, guided the ordering of titles and their authors in the inventory's section on Persian poetry.

PRIVILEGING THE LONG FORM

The section on Persian poetry (230–59) can be roughly divided into three subsections, despite a lack of headings. The initial subsection (230–37) focuses on works by authors known primarily for writing mathnawīs, commencing with Jalal al-Dīn Rumi (d. 1273) and concluding with Jami. Not all the books listed in this subsection, however, are mathnawīs. But that should not be viewed as an oddity, because the manner of listing adheres to 'Atufi's general classification scheme, which groups titles according to the main literary output of their authors. So the subsection on mathnawīs, and indeed the whole section on Persian poetry, begins with multiple copies of Rumi's Mathnawī (more than twenty, when volumes of selections are counted), followed by a copy of his divan and three copies of the divan of his son, Sultan Walad (d. 1312).

The special status accorded to Rumi's Mathnawī as the first book listed in this section testifies to the Ottoman court's long association with and interest in the Mevlevi Sufi order. Murad II (r. 1421–51) gave support to the order and had a Mevlevi lodge built in Edirne. After the conquest of the Mevlevi seat of Konya from the Karamanids, Mehmed II had his officials register the pious foundations of the city. The officials also produced a catalogue of the library of the foundation of Shaykh Sadr al-Dīn (d. 1274), son-in-law to the mystic Ibn 'Arabi

(d. 1240) and a friend of Rumi's. Bayezid II, who like his grandfather was sympathetic to the order, patronized Mevlevi poets and enlarged Rumi's shrine in Konya.⁷ Thus the privileging of Rumi's Mathnawī was not solely based on literary merit, and also underscores the importance of the text in the eventual development of an Ottoman literary Persian within Mevlevi circles and beyond.⁸

The next set of titles belongs to 'Attar (d. 1221), whose reputation as a mathnawī author was revived in the latter half of the fifteenth century by Jami and his eastern contemporaries in their biographical writings and through the composition of jawābs, or response poems. Furthermore, it was at this time that legends expressly linking 'Attar and Rumi in a spiritual and literary chain came to be written down. According to Jami's Nafahāt al-uns (Breaths of Fellowship), 'Attar personally gave a copy of his Asrār-nāma (Book of Secrets) to the young Rumi when they met in Nishapur and even recognized Rumi as his future successor in the mystical mathnawī genre.⁹ That 'Attar's works are recorded immediately after Rumi's, mainly as individual titles, reflects his recently elevated status in the Persian canon. All of 'Attar's major mathnawīs are represented, from the Ilāhī-nāma (Divine Book) to the Mantiq al-tayr (Conference of the Birds); for the latter, five volumes are listed, the most of any mathnawī.

The ensuing entries are works by authors not necessarily known for the mystical content of their poetry, but whose mathnawīs—didactic, epic, or romantic—were popular and often emulated. Listed separately are ten volumes of the quintet of mathnawīs by Nizami (d. 1209), his Khamṣa, and a dozen of the response to it by Amir Khusraw (d. 1325), accompanied by a baker's dozen of his divan. Also listed are nine volumes of the Kullīyyāt of Sa'di (d. 1292), his complete works in verse and prose. The recording of Sa'di's literary output here seems to have been dictated by virtue of his Bustān (Orchard), his only mathnawī proper. The only exception is the inclusion of a dozen copies of the divan of Hafiz (d. 1390), who was revered for his skill in the lyrical ghazal. But the inclusion of Hafiz in this subsection is not unexpected. All the poets cited so far had become canonical by the time the inventory was compiled, and it appears that the opinion and literary efforts of Jami played no small part in their ordering.

The subsection conspicuously ends with a listing of works by Jami, who regarded Rumi as a master poet not only of the mathnawī but also of the ghazal. While Jami did not produce a direct response to Rumi's magnum opus, he did so for many ghazals of his predecessors.¹⁰ In fact, the vast majority of Jami's oeuvre consists of responses to past works. Five of the seven mathnawīs that comprise his Haft awrang (Seven Thrones) were modeled on the poems of Nizami and Amir Khusraw. His Bahāristān (Spring Garden), written for his son's education, looked to Sa'di's Gulistān (Rose Garden) for inspiration. His Nafahāt al-uns was partially a continuation of 'Attar's Tadhkirāt al-awlīyā' (Memorial of the Saints), his biographical compendium of mystics. Jami's organization of his divan into three periods by age was taken from Amir Khusraw, and his ghazals drew on those of Amir Khusraw and Hafiz.¹¹ Individual copies of almost all the works cited for Jami are recorded (including a dozen copies of his divan alone), alongside several volumes of his Kullīyyāt and Khamṣa, his original response to Nizami's quintet.¹²

As far as we can gather from the sixteenth-century biographers of poets, the Ottoman court, especially under Bayezid II, showed much appreciation for Jami's mathnawīs and was receptive to their Turkish responses. Bihiṣṭi Ahmed Çelebi (d. ca. 1511), for instance, produced the first Turkish khamṣa, which was likely a response to Jami's quintet, and the poems were presented as separate pieces to Bayezid II.¹³ Bihiṣṭi began composing his series of mathnawīs sometime in the 1490s, after a spell in Herat. The story goes that Bihiṣṭi fell out of favor with Bayezid II and fled to Herat. The poet eventually returned to Istanbul with a letter of intercession from Jami and 'Alī Shir Nawa'i (d. 1501), the leading literary figure at the Timurid court, and regained the support of Bayezid II.¹⁴ Another poet at the time, Hamdi (d. 1503), composed a Turkish khamṣa that was also modeled after Jami's. According to one biographer, Hamdi had been in correspondence with Jami for a while.¹⁵ Still, the response Hamdi composed to Jami's Yūsuf wa-Zulaykhā, which he submitted to Bayezid II, did not receive the expected approval. Out of disappointment, Hamdi removed from the work his dedication to the sultan.¹⁶ As this episode demonstrates, however much Jami's mathnawīs were appreciated at the Ottoman court, the Turkish responses produced by local poets were not always positively received.

Remarkably, none of the mathnawīs listed so far in 'Atufi's inventory is said to have been illustrated (muṣawwar). This is curious, since the court coveted illustrated books, and mathnawīs adorned with miniature paintings were prized possessions and routine gifts brought by visiting emissaries and princes from the east. We know, for example, that an illustrated copy of Nizami's Khamṣa and another of 'Assar Tabrizi's fourteenth-century romance Mihr u Mushtarī (Sun and Jupiter), both made in Herat, were sent from the Timurid court to Mehmed II and Bayezid II respectively.¹⁷ We know as well that another copy of Nizami's Khamṣa, also prepared in Herat but only incompletely illustrated, was probably presented to Mehmed II by the Aqqoyunlu prince Uğurlu Mehmed (d. 1479), Uzun Hasan's eldest son, who sought refuge at the court in 1474; additions to the work were made under Bayezid II.¹⁸ As luxury products, most illustrated books were stored separately and somewhat haphazardly in the Topkapı Palace's Inner Treasury, of which the library was a part.¹⁹ In the preface to his inventory, 'Atufi notes that he was tasked with registering the titles of books stored in the entire Inner Treasury and adds that the "rarest of books" (kitāblarun nefā'isi) ought not be mixed with others but should be held in a different place within it.²⁰

How can we account, then, for the lack of references to illustrated books? It can be attributed to the method by which 'Atufi recorded the titles. In the preface, he makes it clear that the entries were taken from the titles inscribed on the opening page (zahr) and/or the binding flap (miqlab) of the books.²¹ There is no indication that 'Atufi and his assistants were required to describe the physical details of a book—that is, whether a copy was illustrated, illuminated, or decoratively bound. Rather, the primary purpose of the inventory was to classify the books by subject or category (fann) in a convenient fashion. 'Atufi mentions that Bayezid II himself prescribed this method.²² In fact, for the whole inventory, we come across only ten titles designated as "illustrated."²³ There may well have been many more illustrated books in the collection. But the lack of references highlights the limitations of the inventory for estimating how many of the listed books were illustrated, either in part or in full, and also for determining which books were counted as rare or deluxe copies.

A SERIES OF SHORTER VERSE COLLECTIONS

The next subsection (238–48), the largest in terms of volumes listed, concerns poets whose reputation is based mainly on their skill in either the panegyric qaṣīda or the ghazal. As might be expected, the entries for their poems consist predominantly of divans. Moreover, there is a chronology of sorts in the ordering of the entries. This subsection on shorter verse starts with an entry for the divan of Kamal Khujandi (d. 1400), a favorite peer of Hafiz who influenced Jami and was also famed for his ghazals, and the penultimate entry is for two qaṣīdas assigned to a Riyazi in tribute to Bayezid II.²⁴ The Riyazi in question is almost certainly a local contemporary poet, and the last among several such poets whose work in Persian is recorded here.²⁵

The first series of titles (238–40) is associated with poets who were active until the early fifteenth century. After a listing of multiple copies of Kamal's divan, copies of the divans of Anwari (d. late twelfth century) and Salman Sawaji (d. 1376) are recorded. The two poets were esteemed as panegyrists, and Jami considered Anwari one of the "prophets" of Persian poetry.²⁶ Listed subsequently are copies of the Kullīyyāt of 'Imad al-Din Faqih (d. 1371), a rival of Hafiz, and of the divans of Qasim Anwar (d. 1433) and Hasan Dihlawi (d. 1327). These poets were recognized for their ghazals, and all the poets mentioned thus far are among the exemplars Jami notes in his Bahāristān, with the exception of Qasim.²⁷ The inclusion of Qasim here seems a bit out of place, since his overtly mystical poems were not regarded as extraordinary. Furthermore, during his life, Qasim was suspected of being sympathetic to the heretical Hurufi sect.²⁸ One wonders, then, whether the copies of his divan were acquired under Mehmed II, who had shown interest in Hurufi teachings for some time in his youth.²⁹ In any case, the series ends with a few works labeled Qalandar, most notably a divan attributed to a Najm al-Din. This divan is probably a compilation of poems by Najm al-Din Razi (Daya, d. 1256), a disciple of the Kubravi order whose rubā'īs, or quatrains, Rumi was familiar with.³⁰

Oddly, it is after these works that copies of Firdawsī's eleventh-century Shāhnāma (Book of Kings) are enumerated (seven in total, including a selection), but with no attribution of authorship (240). Most copies were likely prose versions of the epic, and one of them is indicated as being illustrated, making it the first illustrated volume that we encounter in our section on Persian poetry. It is impossible, however, to ascertain which extant illustrated copy of the Shāhnāma at the Topkapı Library or elsewhere the entry might denote. The current holdings of the Topkapı Library include close to fifteen copies of the work that predate the inventory. Nonetheless, the date of acquisition for nearly all of these remains unclear.³¹ The situation is also complicated by the possibility that the designated copy may have been purchased on the open market, perhaps from Shiraz, and was not acquired as a gift.³² Considering the location of the Shāhnāma entries and the relatively small number of copies credited, we can deduce that its value as a literary work was much less appreciated at the time.

The ensuing titles (240–45) are also by poets from the fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries. This series begins with entries for the works of Katibi (d. 1434), a poet reputed for his ghazals. Other lyricists featured are Katibi's contemporaries 'Ismat (d. 1425) and Bisati (d. 1412), with copies of their divans recorded together with those of Ibn Yamin (d. 1368), a master of the qīṭa', or poetic fragment. Yet two poets in particular stand out, Khwaju Kirmani (d. ca. 1349) and Sana'i (d. ca. 1130), by the sheer number of volumes attributed to them: eleven and sixteen, respectively. Khwaju was a prolific lyricist, who compiled two separate divans and for whose ghazals Hafiz composed naẓīras, or parallel poems.³³ Similarly, Khwaju produced a quintet of mathnawīs in response to Nizami's. Sana'i was equally prolific and renowned for his homiletic poetry composed in a broad range of forms, the most popular being his mathnawī Ḥadiqat al-ḥaqīqa (Garden of Truth). The diverse output of both Khwaju and Sana'i is well reflected in the titles listed. And their pairing here does not seem to be coincidental, since Khwaju also relied on Sana'i as a model for his didactic mathnawīs.³⁴

The series concludes with a list of works by a disparate group of authors of varying reputation. Recorded are multiple copies of the mathnawīs of two minor poets, Husayni Sadat (d. after 1328) and Awhadi Maragha'i (d. 1338), the most noteworthy poem being the latter's Jām-i Jam (Jamshid's Cup), a response to Sana'i's Ḥadīqat. Recorded next are copies of the divan of the Jalayirid ruler Sultan Ahmad (d. 1410), better known for his artistic patronage, and the Kullīyyāt of the prominent satirist 'Ubayd Zakani (d. ca. 1370). The series ends with entries for the Kullīyyāt of the allegorist Fattahi (d. 1448), the divan of Cem Sultan (d. 1495), Bayezid II's brother and rival to the throne, and more copies of Amir Khusraw's works. Although not strictly chronological, the list of titles and authors provided in this portion of the subsection functions as a virtual bibliographic digest of the development of Persian poetry up to the time of Bayezid II's reign, culminating so to speak with his late brother's divan.³⁵

If the previous portion is arranged according to a chronological logic, what follows is ad hoc at best: a long series of titles and authors with no distinct groupings or obvious breaks (245–48). Here we come across the works of numerous older poets that we might have expected to be recorded earlier, and also titles by contemporary poets active in the east. There are even entries for copies of the divan of Jahan-Malik Khatun (d. after 1383), an Injuid princess who resided in Shiraz at the same time as Khwaju, 'Ubayd, and Hafiz.³⁶ In addition, we find the recent works of a dozen or so émigré and local poets. The assemblage of works appears to have been made purely out of convenience. Most of the titles listed are lone copies of individual divans or works represented by a few copies; multiple entries assigned to a single poet are sporadic.

Of the older poets recorded in this block of titles, some are better known than others. Among those with multiple entries are the satirist Suzani (d. 1173), the panegyrists Nasir Khusraw (d. 1088), Khaqani (d. 1199), and Zahir Faryabi (d. 1201), and the lyricists Nasir Bukhari (d. 1370), Khayali (d. 1446), and Shahi (d. 1453); all of them are also noted in Jami's Bahāristān.³⁷ Worth naming as well are some mystical poets with multiple entries, 'Iraqi (d. 1289), Nizari (d. 1321), and Maghribi (d. 1407), celebrated for their ghazals and mentioned in either the Bahāristān or the Nafahāt al-uns.³⁸ The works of these poets, together with those of others already mentioned, can be regarded as constituting a classical or "ancient" corpus of texts, which Jami seems to have regarded as being worthy of study and emulation. The only real contemporary poet that Jami mentions in the Bahāristān is Nawa'i, who ironically composed verse chiefly in Chagatai.

The block of titles also contains entries for a handful of poets active during Bayezid II's reign, whom we can properly identify from other biographical writings produced after the Bahāristān (1487), primarily the Majālis al-nafā'is (Assemblies of the Distinguished, completed in 1498) of Nawa'i, which has chapters devoted to poets current at the time. Here we find, for instance, a one-volume compilation of the divans of Suhayli (d. 1501) and Sayfi Bukhari (d. 1504) and single copies of the divans of three of their relatively obscure peers: Shihab, Yari, and Dhati. However, we do not find the works of Banna'i (d. 1512) and Asafi (d. 1517), two poets with whom Nawa'i was personally acquainted and who are given conspicuous recognition in his Majālis.³⁹ The general absence of contemporary poets in the inventory is telling, for it parallels the tendency of biographical writings to valorize past luminaries. By the same token, it suggests that Nawa'i's opinion of his contemporaries had a limited impact on what was acquired by the Ottoman court up to the time the inventory was compiled.⁴⁰

Intermingled with the divans of the older poets are those of émigré and local poets. A number of them were connected with Mehmed II's court: Hamidi (d. after 1481) and Qabuli (Kabuli, d. 1478), émigré poets from Isfahan and Shirvan, respectively, and La'ali (Le'ali, d. after 1481), a poet originally from Tokat in central Anatolia who arrived in Istanbul after a stay in Herat. A compilation of La'ali's poems in both Persian and Turkish is recorded. Also recorded is a compilation credited to Nishani (Nişani) or Karamanlı Mehmed Pasha (d. 1481), Mehmed II's last grand vizier. One poet's connection with the court predates Mehmed II's reign: Ahmed Da'i (d. after 1421), who found favor with Bayezid I's son, Süleyman Çelebi (d. 1411), in Edirne and whose divan is listed as an autograph copy. Of poets active during Bayezid II's reign, we can identify only a few with any degree of certainty: the aforementioned Riyazi, a graduate of the Semaniye madrasa in Istanbul (which was founded by Mehmed II) who lived into Süleyman's reign (r. 1520–66), and Basiri (d. 1535), who is credited with a divan.⁴¹ Basiri initially visited Istanbul from Herat in 1491, with a letter of recommendation from Jami and Nawa'i, and several years later he would settle permanently there and enjoy the court's patronage. It appears that Basiri also brought books along during his initial visit, including a copy of Nawa'i's divan that was likely presented to Bayezid II.⁴² The case of Basiri highlights the important role that émigré literati played in the circulation and collection of works in Persian and other languages.

The last and arguably the most intriguing poet based in Istanbul, two copies of whose divan are recorded in the inventory, is Shaykh Wafa' (Vefa', d. 1491). He was head of a Zeyni lodge in the city, and had a close relationship with Mehmed II, as well as with members of the sultan's intimate circle (including the royal librarian Molla Lutfi and his teacher Sinan Pasha). It is probably owing to these social ties that the copies of his divan entered the Topkapı Library, since Shaykh Wafa' was not an eminent poet and in fact was better known for his later support of Karamanlı Mehmed Pasha, who had backed Cem Sultan's failed bid to succeed Mehmed II. Nevertheless, the example of Shaykh Wafa' demonstrates that the local production of Persian verse was driven principally by mystics, whether or not they were Mevlevi in inclination.⁴³ The interest of these mystics in Persian verse extended to collecting books as well. The sizeable lending library that Shaykh Wafa' founded in his lodge had a section devoted to Persian divans.⁴⁴ Within the Topkapı Library collection, it is evident that the locally compiled works came from a fairly small circle of poets affiliated with the court.

SUNDRY OTHERS

The third and last subsection (249–59) is less coherent than the previous ones, and the majority of the titles listed are mathnawīs of assorted content, reflecting the flexibility of the poetic form. Also, many of them have no authorial attribution. The works are recorded in two blocks of titles, which are divided by a listing of multiple copies of the Gulshan-i rāz (The Secret Rose Garden), a popular exposition of mystical doctrine by Mahmud Shabistari (d. ca. 1340). The subsection concludes with a separate listing of more conventional religious titles in verse: accounts of the life of the Prophet, siyar al-Nabī, and translations of the hundred sayings of 'Alī, Ṣad kalima. The titles in this subsection range from well-known works such as the Rubā'īyyāt of 'Umar Khayyam (d. 1131) to little-known ones such as the Muḥabbatnāma (Book of Love) of Ibn Nasuh Shirazi (d. 1391), along with numerous copies of majmū'as, or anthologies.

The first block of titles, which is shorter than the second, is a mix of older and more recent works, unattributed and attributed (249–52). Almost all the titles without a name attached are easy to attribute. For example, copies of the Zafarnāma (Book of Victory) in the list undoubtedly refer to the epic of Hamd Allah Mustawfi (d. 1349); similarly, a copy of the Sham' u Parwāna (Candle and Moth) that is mentioned must be the allegory of an obscure poet named Fahmi, possibly an émigré, who composed it for Bayezid II.⁴⁵ Some works are more difficult to attribute, such as the versified versions of the story of Yusuf or of Kalila wa-Dimna, for which a few authors may apply.⁴⁶ Listed beside these are immediately identifiable mystical works in prose, mixed with verse, such as the Nuzhat al-arwāḥ (Delight of Souls) and the Ṭarab al-majālis (Joy of Assemblies), both by Amir Husayni (d. 1328). Of the works that are attributed, a few belong to minor poets such as 'Arif Ardabili (fl. ca. 1369), whose romance Farhādnāma is listed as an autograph copy.

The most recent works listed were locally produced in Istanbul. Here we encounter three entries, without attribution, for chronicles in verse about Mehmed II. The first is a work entitled the Ghazānāma-i Rūm (Epic of the Conquest of Rum); the others are cited simply as tawārikh, or histories. The Ghazānāma clearly refers to the chronicle of that name by Kashifi (Kaşifi, fl. ca. 1478), an émigré poet. The chronicle recounts Mehmed II's military exploits in the manner of the Shāhnāma, and was written to secure patronage toward the end of his reign. The other two were probably comparable campaign books produced around the time and might be copies of the now lost chronicles by Hamidi and a certain Shahdi (Şehdi).⁴⁷ We know that Mehmed II had specifically commissioned Shahdi to compose a Shāhnāma-style chronicle. There is also a chronicle devoted to Bayezid II, recorded simply as a qışsa, or story, and unattributed. In addition to the chronicles, we also come across a risāla in verse eulogizing Bayezid II that is credited to Shaykh Wafa' (which almost certainly represents Shaykh Wafa's attempt to forge an alliance with the new sultan after having previously supported his rival, Cem), and a Rāḥat al-'ushshāq (Comfort of Lovers) to Saba'i (d. after 1509), a disciple of this shaykh.⁴⁸

The longer second block (252–59) similarly comprises a mix of old and new titles. In this part, we find entries for works such as the eleventh-century romance Warqa wa-Gulshāh (likely 'Ayyuqi's); munāẓarāt, or dispute poems, assigned to Mas'ud Sa'd Salman (d. 1121); the allegory Ḥālnāma (Book of Ecstasy), which is certainly by 'Arifi (d. 1449); and Khusraw u Shirin by Hatifi (d. 1520), Jami's nephew. There are also entries for the Kullīyyāt of Bushaq Aṭ'ima (d. 1423 or 1427), whose verses were mostly parodies. Regarding locally produced works, we come across entries for a versified account of the Shi'i Imam Husayn's martyrdom attributed to Ahmedi (d. 1413), a peer of Ahmed Da'i; a satirical munāẓara entitled Baḥth-i Kūn u Kus (Debate of Ass and Pussy) by Qabuli; a versified account of the martyrdom of 'Ali's companions 'Abis b. Abi Shabib and Habib b. Muzahir; and a collection of hazliyyāt, or facetiae, by Kashifi. As far as we are aware, none of these works has survived. As for Kashifi, we encounter an entry for another chronicle of his, Fatḥnāma-i Ighribūz (Eğriboz, Euboea), dealing with Mehmed II's conquests. In addition to a few panegyric poems, there are two chronicles devoted to Bayezid II, both recorded as qışsas, with one specifically stating that it concerns the beginning of his reign. This qışsa in all probability refers to the Shāhnāma or Bāyezīdnāma produced at the court in 1486, covering the years 1481–84. It was the first work of its kind to be illustrated, and is still housed at the Topkapı Library.⁴⁹

Interestingly, another copy of this Shāhnāma has survived that was illustrated much later, in the nineteenth century, in Qajar Iran.⁵⁰ That it was illustrated so late suggests that the copies of the qışsas devoted to Bayezid II were ultimately intended to be illustrated. We know that, from the 1490s onward under Bayezid II, the court-sponsored production of illustrated historical and literary titles greatly expanded.⁵¹ The increase in production suggests as well that some of the individual copies of the literary mathnawīs we find here were not unique but rather made to be illustrated. One mathnawī particularly stands out in this respect, 'Assar's Mihr u Mushtarī. Recorded sporadically in this subsection are eight copies of the poem, which is also referred to as the Ishqnāma (Book of Love), a somewhat surprising number for a romance that appears to have been more popular as an illustrated text than as a work to be emulated (249–51, 253–54).⁵² At the time, only a single response to the poem was composed in Persian by Jamal Ardistani (d. 1474), and the first response in Turkish was written at the turn of the century by Bihişti.⁵³ Mihr u Mushtarī is the only other text designated as "illustrated" in the entire section on Persian poetry, and this entry no doubt refers to the gift-copy sent to Bayezid II from Herat. Thus the fact that there are so many copies of Mihr u Mushtarī listed here may be accounted for by its perceived value as an illustrated work.

A similar function appears to underlie the multiple copies of the Maqāmāt (Standings) of Hamidi (d. 1164) recorded toward the end of the subsection (257–58). The work, though not exactly a translation, is based heavily on the Arabic version of al-Hariri (d. 1122), of which there are also several copies in the inventory.⁵⁴ Significantly for us, this Persian work was appreciated for neither its literary nor stylistic merits; instead, interest in it was due to the popularity of the maqāmāt as an illustrated genre. Likewise is the case with copies of the Persian translation of 'Ali's Mi'at Kalima (Ṣad Kalima, One Hundred Sayings), which was often luxuriously illuminated. If the subsection is less cohesively structured according to author, or even by genre or topic, it is possible that its organization was informed by illustrative concerns.⁵⁵ It is not an accident, however, that the Ṣad Kalima is the final text listed. There is no doubt that the translation or verse paraphrase belongs to Rashid al-Din Watwat (d. 1182), as this is a well-known work of his. Equally renowned were his treatises on rhetoric, of which the biographer Dawlatshah (d. ca. 1494) deems his Ḥadā'iq al-siḥr (Gardens of Magic) one of the most useful in Persian.⁵⁶ Conspicuously, a commentary on Rashid al-Din's treatises and poems is also the last text recorded in the section on Arabic poetry and poetics, which comes immediately before the section on Persian poetry.⁵⁷

In speaking of the method adopted by 'Atufi for recording the Topkapı Palace Library collection, İsmail Erünsal has observed that since there was no established Ottoman tradition of cataloguing, 'Atufi struggled "to create a system which would ... make for some consistency."⁵⁸ This struggle is clearly reflected in the section on Persian poetry, in which the ordering of titles and authors is determined by both form and chronology, and is plainly not always consistent. Nevertheless, the overall arrangement of entries indicates the privileging of past works, texts that had become authoritative by the time 'Atufi compiled the inventory. In this regard, the figure of Jami looms large, a poet and mystic accorded great prestige at the court, and whose own works served to canonize a group of authors. To what extent the personal tastes of either Mehmed II or Bayezid II—beyond mere bibliophilism and their partiality to things Persian—shaped the collection of the books catalogued in this section remains open to debate. What is certain is that the list prepared by 'Atufi, who happened to be a tutor to the palace pages, provided a ready resource for a curriculum of Persian poetry. This curriculum gave pride of place to Rumi's Mathnawī and incorporated other locally produced works as coherently as possible.⁵⁹

Notably, the earliest extant court gift register that features poets begins with 1503, the very year when the final copy of the inventory was made.⁶⁰ It is quite evident from the register that local poets, especially those composing in Turkish, were the chief beneficiaries of the court's largesse. This is not surprising considering the dearth of Turkish divans recorded in the inventory, copies of which number less than fifteen in total; of these, fewer than ten were composed exclusively in Turkish—a tiny fraction compared to the number of Persian divans, which exceed three hundred volumes.⁶¹ Perhaps it was a recognition of the massive shortage of poetry in Turkish that spurred Bayezid II to patronize Ottoman poetic activity in the vernacular on a more regular basis after 1503. If that was indeed the case, then the court's dedicated support started only after its collection of Persian poetry was registered and codified.

One remaining question is what impact the collection of poetic works in Persian may have had beyond courtly circles. We know that poets composing in Turkish began to compare themselves favorably with the Persian masters from this time onward. In fact, early on in Süleyman's reign the practice had become so routine that, in a qaṣīda celebrating the lavish wedding ceremony of the grand vizier Ibrahim Pasha in 1523, Hayali (d. 1557) declares himself a second Jami in the invention of ideas and comparable to Salman in style.⁶² Such comparisons were not mere boasts, but were direct acknowledgments of the kind of poets the court regarded highly, as represented in the palace library collection. But it could equally be argued that, for those local poets composing exclusively in Turkish, the boastful nods were self-serving responses to the competition they faced for court patronage from the still persistent traffic of poets from the east, and to their conservative tendencies.

The court's partiality to poetry in Persian, especially in mathnawī form, did not wane with the onset of the sixteenth century. Later in his reign in the 1550s, Süleyman established the post of ṣehnāmeçi, or official chronicler, who was charged with eulogizing the military prowess of the sultan in Persian and in a fashion that was obviously modeled after the Shāhnāma.⁶³ It was not until the 1590s that Turkish finally replaced Persian as the ṣehnāmeçi's preferred language of expression and prose overtook verse as the preferred medium. While the court-commissioned chronicles, in either Persian or Turkish, were hardly works of outstanding literary merit, their production does point to a broader development that would take place over the course of the century: the steady appropriation and adaptation of the Persian poetic canon by Ottoman literati at large, and the eventual creation of a Turkish poetic canon toward the last decade through their own biographical writings. In no small measure, then, the curricular nature of the collection catalogued in the inventory of 1502–3 anticipated that development.

40. There is no record of a copy of the Majālis al-nafā’is in the inventory.
41. İsmail Erünsal has credited Persian divans to several more local or Ottoman poets. But none of the poets cited, from what we can gather from contemporaneous biographical writings, actually composed Persian verses (Erünsal, “909 (1503) Tarihli Defter-i Kütüb,” 256).
42. Laṭīfī, Tezkiretü’ş-Şu’arā, 189.
43. Another example is the Naqshbandi Shaykh ‘Abdallāh İlahi (d. 1491), who settled in Istanbul at the beginning of Bayezid II’s reign and composed verse mainly in Persian. See İsmail Hikmet Ertaylan, ed., İlāhî Dîvanı (Istanbul, 1961).
44. Erünsal, Ottoman Libraries, 128, 145. Cf. Erünsal, “Şeyh Vefâ ve Vakıfları Hakkında Yeni Bir Belge,” İslam Araştırmaları Dergisi 1 (1997): 47–64.

46. Encyclopædia Iranica, s.v. “Joseph i. In Persian Literature,” by Ashghar Dadbeh; Encyclopædia Iranica, s.v. “Kalila wa Demna i. Redactions and Circulation,” by Dagmar Riedel. One of the versified stories of Yusuf is attributed to Jamal Ardistani, but the others are not. Moreover, some of the works ascribed to “Jamali” are actually by Jamal Ardistani, not Jamali (d. 1535). This apparently was a common mistake. See Encyclopædia Iranica, s.v. “Jamālī, Hāmed b. Faẓl-Allāh,” by A. A. Seyed-Gohrab.
47. İsmail Hakkı Ertaylan, ed., Külliyât-ı Dîvân-ı Mevlânâ Hāmidî (Istanbul, 1949), 73; Sehî, Heşt Behîşt, 197. One of the unattributed chronicles could also be the Shāhnāma-style Khunkār-nāma of Ma’ali (Me’ali), which was written around the same time.
48. On Saba’i, see Sehî, Heşt Behîşt, 206–7.
49. Sara Nur Yıldız, “Ottoman Historical Writing in Persian, 1400–1600,” in Persian Historiography, ed. Charles Melville (London, 2012), 436–502, at 456–61. Cf. Encyclopædia Iranica, s.v. “Historiography. xiv. The Ottoman Empire,” by Sara Nur Yıldız. The Shāhnāma or Bāyezîdnāma has usually been attributed to Malik Um̄mi (Melik Ümmi), an émigré who was part of Bayezid II’s entourage. However, Andrew C. S. Peacock has recently communicated to me his discovery that the author is a poet with the pen name Ahi. I would like to thank him for sharing this new and significant finding. And there is indeed a divan ascribed to an Ahi in the inventory (MS Török F. 59, 246, 247).

Meliha Anbarcıoğlu, “Türk ve İran Edebiyatlarında Mihr u Mah ve Mihr u Müşterî Mesnevîleri,” Belleten 47 (1983): 1151–89. The Ottoman interest in responding to Mihr u Mushtarî may have been prompted by Jami, who mentions ‘Assar in the Bahāristān (87).

55. I would like to thank David J. Roxburgh for suggesting the importance of this aspect of the inventory at the workshop held at Harvard University, April 4–6, 2014.

57. MS Török F. 59, 228. A copy of Watwat’s divan is recorded in the section on Arabic poetry and poetics as well (211).
58. Erünsal, Ottoman Libraries, 146.
59. For those who wished to improve their knowledge and command of Persian vocabulary, the palace library held several dictionaries and lexicographical treatises as further reference material. Noteworthy works recorded in the inventory (in the section on dictionaries and elsewhere) include Hindushah Nakhchivani’s thirteenth-century al-Şihāḥ al-‘ajamiyya (Sound Aspects of Persian), a Persian-Azeri Turkish glossary with a brief outline of grammar, of which two copies are listed (297, 299); Fakhri Isfahani’s fourteenth-century Miṣṣār Jamālî (Measure for Jamal, 228), the fourth part of which is a Persian explanatory dictionary of words used by poets; and an unnamed treatise or lexicon in Arabic, Persian, and Turkish, probably of the niṣāb variety—that is, vocabularies in verse compiled for their mnemonic value (294). Perhaps most noteworthy are the two dictionaries attributed to Halimi (d. 1516): the Muṣarriḥat al-asmā’ (Explanation of Nouns), his trilingual dictionary of nouns; and another simply entitled Durar (Pearls) (295, 297). The latter undoubtedly refers to the Persian-Turkish dictionary that Halimi submitted to Mehmed II in 1477, defined with examples taken from Persian poetry (see Halimî, Lügat-i Halimî, ed. Adem Uzun [Ankara, 2013]).
60. See Erünsal, “II. Bâyezîd Devrine Ait Bir İn’âmât Defteri.”
61. MS Török F. 59, 261–62. Not included in this count are divans “in Turkic” (bi-al-Mughūliyya).
62. For the relevant verses, see Mehmed Çavuşoğlu, “Kaside,” Türk Dili 52 (1986): 17–77, at 52–55.

BOOKS ON THE SECRETARIAL ARTS AND LITERARY PROSE

Although it is a product of the Ottoman court, the library catalogue does not describe the contours of Ottoman Turkish prose writing at the turn of the sixteenth century. This is because a distinctly Ottoman, high-register Turkish idiom was only taking its first tentative steps at the time ‘Atufi compiled his inventory of Bayezid II’s library in 908 (1502–3) and transcribed it in a clean copy one year later. To be sure, the Ottoman palace library of this time contained many classics of the scribal arts, yet the vast majority of these works were written in Arabic or Persian. Of the entire collection of 136 entries pertaining to epistolography, diplomatics, and prose style listed in ‘Atufi’s inventory, only four are identifiable as Turkish, and two of these are translations of Persian works.

The relative dearth of Turkish manuals, prose collections, and anthologies of aphorisms in Bayezid II’s reign (1481–1512) is all the more surprising when we consider the explosion of hyperliterate Ottoman Turkish in the sixteenth century. Within a generation, the Ottoman chancery would abandon the composition of foreign diplomatic missives in the various languages of their correspondents in favor of a confident Turkish befitting a rapidly consolidating imperial culture. To wit, the last Ottoman royal letter in Greek addressed to the Venetian Doge was a victory announcement in the wake of the Ottoman campaign in Hungary and Austria in 1529.¹ The same was true of Ottoman interactions with their eastern neighbors. Whereas Sultan Selim I (r. 1512–20) corresponded with Shah Isma‘il (r. 1501–24) in Persian—even as he received replies from Isma‘il in Turkish—his son Sultan Süleyman (r. 1520–66) dealt with the Safavid rulers primarily in Turkish.² Beyond the narrow confines of Ottoman diplomatic protocol and administrative practice, scholars and belle-lettrists in Ottoman lands increasingly collected their Turkish prose writing in carefully curated compendia and offered them to friends and colleagues as examples of fine prose. For instance, the poet and Naqshbandi shaykh Lami‘i Çelebi gathered his personal correspondence—most, although not all, of which was Turkish—in a single volume some time before his death in 1532.³ Other prominent scholars, such as Kemalpaşazade (d. 1534) and Celalzade Salih Çelebi (d. 1565)—the brother of the famed Ottoman chancellor of Süleyman’s reign—compiled their own collections, significant portions of which consisted of private correspondence with learned colleagues.⁴

Modern scholars usually trace the rise of hyperliterate Turkish by pointing to the few examples of Turkish epistolographical manuals from the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries in order to suggest that these antecedents factored in the inception and development of the ornate administrative Turkish prose of the sixteenth century.⁵ Consequently, the first Turkish epistolographic manual from Anatolia, Ahmed-i Da‘i’s Teressül (Chancery Epistolography), looms large mostly because of its early composition before 1417. Later works, such as the Teressül of Kırımlu Hafız Hüsam (1431), the Menāhicü’l-inşā’ (Methods of Epistolography) by Yahya bin Mehmed (1477), and the Gülşen-i inşā’ (Rose Garden of Epistolography, 219 [5–6]) by Şeyh Mahmud bin Edhem (1496), also are cited frequently as important way stations on the road to a discernibly Ottoman idiom.⁶ These works indicate that Turkish was used as an administrative language within Ottoman domains from an early date.⁷ Similarly, especially in the fifteenth century, there is a growing body of literature in Turkish, including translations of Arabic and Persian classics such as the ‘Antarnāma (The Book of ‘Antar) and Nizami’s Layla va

Majnūn (Layla and Majnun) (188 {5–7}, 264 {6–9}). Adding to these epics of prose and poetry, writers in Anatolia penned original works in Turkish, most notably on religious themes.⁸

Yet the ornate and confident Ottoman Turkish of the sixteenth century was not necessarily modeled upon these literary works. Even in terms of administrative language, the link between fourteenth-century documents and later Ottoman Turkish is uncertain. Despite the importance of these early Turkish works, there are several problems with presenting them as direct antecedents of a mature Ottoman Turkish prose tradition. First, on stylistic grounds, the earlier works stand in some contrast with later examples. Although Şinasi Tekin views the prose of Menāhicü'l-inşā' as an intermediary step between the simple Turkish of the early fifteenth century and the ornate style of the sixteenth century, little work has been done to substantiate a connection between the stylistic sensibilities of the chancery of Mehmed II (r. 1451–81) and that of later periods.⁹ Second, the contents of the early works, especially Ahmed-i Da'i's collection, reflect more the administrative concerns of the small principalities of the Anatolian borderlands than the ideological preoccupations of a large empire with pretensions to universal rule.¹⁰ Third, the two secretarial manuals exist in unique manuscripts and there is little indication that they circulated or had much impact beyond the immediate circles and lifetime of their authors.¹¹ This last point is also reflected in 'Atufi's inventory. Neither Ahmed-i Da'i's Teressül nor Yahya bin Mehmed's Menāhicü'l-inşā' figure in the collection. Şeyh Mahmud bin Edhem's aforementioned Gülşen-i inşā' admittedly is something of an exception, as it was presented to Bayezid II, included in 'Atufi's inventory, and exists in a number of manuscript recensions.

The outsize significance attributed to these early Turkish works likely stems from modern scholarly traditions informed by a twentieth-century concern with nationally circumscribed historiographical fields that privileges the linear evolution of distinct monolingual literary traditions, whether Turkish, Persian, or Arabic. As early examples of administrative Turkish in Anatolia, the works of Ahmed-i Da'i and Yahya bin Mehmed fit neatly within a progressive development of Ottoman

Turkish between the fourteenth and sixteenth centuries. Significantly, these were among the first early Ottoman prose manuscripts available to modern scholars through editions in the twentieth century. Yet as suggested by the absence of these works and indeed, Turkish works more generally, in the Ottoman palace library, such strict divisions along linguistic lines may be misguided. Consider in this regard the work of another Ottoman scholar who is occasionally mentioned by modern historians as an important producer of early Ottoman prose writing. The scholar, Hüsamzade Mustafa Efendi (fl. 1488), was a judge and teacher during the reign of Sultan Mehmed II and completed a prose composition collection containing letters to friends around 1487 that was subsequently included in the palace library.¹² The work, Risāla-yi şawqīya (The Treatise of Amicable Wishes), appears to have been well regarded by later generations, as the sixteenth-century Ottoman biographer, Mecdi, lauds Hüsamzade for his mastery of fine prose writing.¹³ Even so, Mecdi adds that the celebrated stylist's oeuvre mostly consists of Arabic correspondence with few Persian letters and even fewer in Turkish.¹⁴ Rather than constituting an early example of a nascent Ottoman Turkish idiom, Hüsamzade's collection celebrates the multilingual and cosmopolitan cultural terrain of fifteenth-century Islamic lands. Such an approach was not confined to the scholarly religious classes. One generation later, the multilingual approach persisted among secretaries in Ottoman lands, for during the reign of Selim I, an unidentified scribe presented to the sultan a secretarial manual entitled Laṭā'ifnāma (The Book of Subtle Graces).¹⁵ The work opens with a preface in Arabic and an introduction in Persian, in which the author holds up the classic prose works of Ibn al-Muqaffa' and Ibn al-Athir as inspirations.¹⁶ The main sections of the work are more or less evenly divided between Persian, Turkish, and Arabic.¹⁷

The organization of the poetics collection in the palace library reflects this multilingual approach. Unlike any other section of the library, the literary material is divided into three broad sections (taşnīf) that pertain to Arabic, Persian, or Turkish verse. Such a division thus maintains a linguistic differentiation with respect to poetry. Yet within these three sections, all of the works related to prose writing and the scribal arts are subsumed within the broader section (taṣnīf) of Arabic poetics. This organization may have developed for the sake of convenience, but it also reflects a more general understanding of the place of prose writing within the broader classification of the sciences (taqṣīm al-‘ulūm). Within most classification systems, literary sciences were placed within the larger framework of linguistic sciences, such as etymology, syntax, grammar, and the like. Because these linguistic sciences developed in relation to the analytical study of Arabic, a strong association existed between all linguistic sciences—irrespective of their particular idiom—and Arabic. Such an association occasionally led scholars to describe bodies of knowledge practiced in Persian or Turkish as belonging to a broader category of Arabic sciences (al-‘ulūm al-‘arabiya). For instance, Idris Bidlisi (1457–1520), a contemporary colleague of ‘Atufi at the Ottoman court, places the science of history, even if written in Persian, among the branches of the Arabic sciences,¹⁸ and the sixteenth-century Ottoman scholar, Taşköprüzade, conflates linguistic sciences with Arabic sciences in his major work on the classification of knowledge.¹⁹ In this sense, although not all of the prose works in the library were in Arabic, their classification within the larger section of Arabic poetics accords well with the general thinking on the place of prose within a larger epistemological framework informed by the “Arabic sciences.”

Although this subsection of Arabic literature actually contains works in three languages—and there is also a single volume in this section identified as Mongolian script (bi-l-khaṭṭ al-mughūlī, 221 {17–18}), but this is most likely eastern Turkish—the works in this section of the library all concern the analysis of prose (nathr). According to the table of contents, the subsection consists of books on oratory (al-khuṭab), proverbs (al-amthāl), rhymed prose (al-saj’), prose composition (al-inshā’), the production of official documents (al-tarassul), and secretarial accounting (al-siyāqa). In short, the section contains the fundamental tools of a secretary and are related to quotidian scribal tasks, such as proper formulas for drawing up official documents and the basic principles of maintaining account books and registers.

Yet the attributes of an ideal secretary extended well beyond the fulfillment of these basic duties to include an intense and carefully cultivated literary persona. Indeed, for secretaries and scholars alike, the science of prose composition (‘ilm al-inshā’), even in administrative forms, was closely associated with eloquent literary expression. Mahmud Gavan (d. 1481), the celebrated Persian stylist and chief minister of the Bahmanid dynasty in the Deccan, includes in the introduction to his theoretical work on this secretarial science, Manāẓir al-inshā’ (Vistas of Prose Composition), separate discourses on two of its fundamental attributes: balāgha (efficacy and eloquence of expression) and faṣāḥa (linguistic purity and euphony), both of which had been extensively elaborated and explored by literary theorists and belle-lettrists in Arabic and Persian.²⁰ Manāẓir al-inshā’ was well-known in Ottoman lands at the turn of the sixteenth century—Bayezid II’s library contains this work (220 {17}), as well as Gavan’s epistolary collection Riyāz al-inshā’ (Gardens of Prose Composition) (220 {14})—and later Ottoman scholars of the sixteenth century adopted the same criteria in their own formal discussions of prose composition. For instance, in his encyclopedia of the sciences, Taşköprüzade defines the science of composition as one that investigates prose “with respect to its linguistic eloquence and euphony” (min ḥaythu annahu balīgh wa-faṣīḥ).²¹

The concern, then, for eloquence and euphony likely informed the association of works of literary prose with works of secretarial composition in this subsection of the palace library. Consequently, the library’s collection of works on literary prose contains a great many anthologies of sermons (khuṭab), rhymed prose (saj’), and proverbs (amthāl). Such anthologies offered the kinds of references, rhymes, similes, and pithy phrases upon which stylists and secretaries might have drawn in the composition of elaborate letters and documents.

The vast majority of these are works in Arabic and date from the late tenth to twelfth centuries. Even those examples in the collection that purport to include earlier material—such as the fifth volume of Abu Sa’d Mansur ibn al-Husayn’s (d. 1030) Nathr al-durr (The Scattering of Pearls, 221 {15–16}) containing sermons from the Umayyad period—tend to date from this later period.²² While the library collection represents many of the great luminaries of Arabic literature from this period, including works by Abu Mansur al-Tha’alibi (961–1039), Raghib al-Isfahani (d. ca. 1040), and Abu ‘Ala’ al-Ma‘arri (d. 1057), the particular works in the collection do not necessarily reflect the most celebrated works by these authors according to twentieth-century standards. So, while the collection contains two copies of al-Tha‘alibi’s Nathr al-Naẓm (Scattering of the Pearl String, 218 {7–9}) and one copy of his Yawāqūt fī ba‘ḍ al-mawāqīt (Rubies for Some Specified Times, 221 {7}), his famous Yatīmat al-dahr (The Precious Pearl of the Age) is absent.²³ Similarly, al-Isfahani’s Majma‘ al-balāgha (The Gathering Place of Eloquence, 218 {7, 11}) is included, yet his Muḥāḍarāt al-udabā’ wa-muḥāwarat al-shu‘arā’ wa-al-bulaghā’ (The Rhetoric of the Belle-Lettrists and the Dialogues of the Poets and the Eloquent) is not.²⁴ Such discrepancies between the works contained in the library and later scholarly assessments may have as much to do with the idiosyncrasies of twentieth-century editing of Arabic literature as it does with any significant lacunae in the Ottoman collection.

Most of the Arabic literary anthologies in ‘Atufi’s inventory, whether of sermons, proverbs, or rhymed prose, originated in the Islamic East. Despite this tendency, the palace library collection is not completely devoid of Arabic prose from the Islamic West. Indeed, there are several notable works from the Maghrib, including Ibn ‘Abd al-Barr’s (d. 1070) verse work of adab entitled Bahjat al-majālis wa uns al-mujālis (The Splendor of Polite Gatherings and the Intimacy of Its Participants, 221 {14–15}) and Abu Ishaq Ibrahim al-Husri’s (d. 1022) anthology of prose and poetry, Kitāb zahr al-ādāb wa-thamar al-albāb (The Book of the Flower of Refinement and the Fruit of the Intellect, 220 {2}). In the centuries after its composition, this latter work of al-Husri rose to considerable prominence in the Islamic West, where in the twelfth century Ibn al-Khayr al-Ishbili listed it in the standard curriculum.²⁵ Al-Husri’s work is also particularly illustrative of the scope and aims of many of the literary anthologies included in the library. Like a great many of these Arabic anthologies, al-Husri compiled his anthology during the Buyid period of the Abbasid caliphate. Although the product of a western scholarly milieu, al-Husri’s anthology is largely based upon a mass of contemporary eastern literary works that had been brought to Qayrawan.²⁶ In an Ottoman library collection that is otherwise lacking in the great works of the Islamic West, al-Husri’s anthology may have been valued, in part, because its contents shared much in common with the eastern anthologies, of which the palace library held so many.

Yet the inclusion of these few titles from the West also highlights the relative paucity of the collection with respect to Maghribi prose literature. For instance, none of Ibn al-Khatib’s work appears in this subsection of the library. The collection’s emphasis on eastern literature is not altogether surprising considering the geographic proximity of the Ottoman court to centers of Arabic learning in Egypt, Syria, and Iranian lands. The affinity of the collection with eastern scholarship is likely also a consequence of the strong ties between Ottoman scholars and centers of learning in Mamluk lands and places east.²⁷ And in this regard, whereas the majority of the anthologies—whether from eastern or western lands—were composed in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, the collection includes several important works of more proximate provenance from Egypt and Syria in the Mamluk period. Most prominent among these works are the biographical dictionaries of belle-lettrists compiled by the poet, secretary, and man of letters Ibn Nubata (d. 1366) and the preeminent scholar Salah al-Din Khalil ibn Aybak al-Safadi (d. 1363).²⁸ ‘Atufi likely included these two biographical dictionaries—entitled Saj‘ al-muṭawwaq (The Cooing of the Ringdove, 221 {9–10}) and Alḥān al-sawāji‘ bayn al-bādi’ wa-al-murāji‘ (The Melodies of the Practitioners of Rhymed Prose among the Initiators and the Verifiers, 218 {9–10}), respectively—in this section of the library because their contents focused on the lives of litterateurs through the presentation of their authors’ correspondence with other literary men in prose and verse. Moreover, the inclusion of saj‘ (rhymed prose) and sawāji‘ (composers of rhymed prose) in their titles underscores the importance of poeticized prose in the post-Abbasid period both with respect to Arabic and Persian belles-lettres. Indeed, the predominance of saj‘ in Persian histories after the twelfth century and its close association with chancery officials has led Julie Scott-Meisami to characterize Persian historical writing of this period as “the chancery style,” due in part to its frequent application of highly poeticized prose to historical narrative.²⁹ In the twentieth century such highly poeticized prose came under widespread criticism among Orientalists and nationally-minded literary critics of Arabic and Persian, and this attitude has continued to influence scholarship in the twenty-first century.³⁰ For both groups, the development marked a departure from a purer literary form that was only revitalized in the context of nineteenth- and twentieth-century cultural projects associated with the establishment and development of the nation-state. In more recent decades, scholars have reassessed this rather negative appraisal and, in this context, the work of Ibn Nubata, among many others, has reemerged as a key touchstone of the aesthetic sensibilities of Mamluk-era Arabic belle-lettrists.³¹ The prominent inclusion of Ibn Nubata's work in the library inventory, along with that of al-Safadi, suggests that we may also extend the scope of their impact to Ottoman lands.

Whereas a majority of the literary anthologies in 'Atufi's inventory are in Arabic, Persian works predominate within the subsections that more closely align with the primary duties of secretaries, namely the formulation of official correspondence, the production of official documents, and financial recordkeeping. Despite the prominence of Persian in these subsections, the library's oldest secretarial compendium is in Arabic: Adab al-kātib (The Etiquette of the Secretary, 219 {11–12}) by Ibn Qutayba (d. 889). More common among the Arabic works in this subsection are letter collections of chancery secretaries, as opposed to formal chancery manuals. Prominent among these is the letter collection of Salah al-Din al-Ayyubi's chief advisor, 'Abd al-Rahim (d. 1200), more commonly known as al-Qadi al-Fadil (219 {6}).³² In one important way, his collection is representative of many of the prose collections of later generations: it contains examples of both official correspondence and private letters. Yet more prominent in the Ottoman collection are the works of al-Qadi al-Fadil's contemporary Rashid al-Din Vatvat (d. 1182–83). The library contains at least four separate titles associated with this single stylist, including his most celebrated epistolary works, Abkār al-afkār fī al-rasā'il wa-al-ash'ār (Maidens of Meditations on Epistles and Poetry, 221 {13–14}, 222 {11–12}) and 'Arā'is al-khawāṭir wa-naḥā'is al-nawādir (The Brides of Minds and the Delicacies of Rarities, 220 {1–2, 8}), as well as more obscure titles, such as 'Umdat al-bulaghā' wa-'uddat al-fuṣaḥā'

(Prop of the Eloquent and Instrument of the Euphonic, 221 {10–11}) and a work referred to simply as Tarassul (219 {12}). Significantly, Rashid al-Din's writings contain examples of official and personal prose in both Arabic and Persian, which suggests that linguistic and literary ecumenism remained an important feature of the cultural landscape at least through the period of 'Atufi's bibliographic indexing.

Even so, such ecumenism does not suggest that the library is devoid of monolingual prose collections. Indeed, one of its striking features is the prominence of Persian prose compilations, especially in the period after the twelfth century. An early example is the collection of Baha' al-Din al-Baghdadi (fl. 1192), entitled Tavassul ilā al-tarassul (Entreatment for the Art of Letter Writing, 218 {16}, 219 {1}, 221 {2}).³³ This Persian prose collection remained a classic for centuries; the Ottoman palace library contains three complete copies of the work, while later in the sixteenth century the chancellor Feridun Beğ made extensive use of the collection to supplement his material from the Seljuq era.³⁴ The predominance of Persian within the collection is even more pronounced in the post-Mongol period. The library contains two copies each of Rawzat al-kuttāb (Garden of the Secretaries, 219 {12–13}, 222 {17}) by Abu Bakr ibn Zaki al-Sadr al-Qunawi (d. thirteenth century)³⁵ and Miftāḥ al-inshā' (The Key of Prose Composition, 220 {1, 18}) by Muhammad ibn Hajji (fl. 1359)³⁶—one of which is a Turkish translation (220 {1})—three copies of Dastūr al-kātib fī ta'yīn al-marātib (The Protocol of the Secretary in the Appointment of Ranks, 219 {16}, 219 {17–18}, 220 {11}) by Muhammad ibn Hindushah Nakhjavani (fl. 1358),³⁷ three copies of Farā'id al-ghiyāṣi (The Ghiyathi-an Precious Gems, 220 {5–7}) by Yusuf Ahi,³⁸ and one copy each of Mahmud Gavan's aforementioned Riyāz al-inshā' and Manāẓir al-inshā' from the latter half of the fifteenth century.³⁹

Yet the preponderance of post-Mongol manuals does not suggest stylistic uniformity within this subsection. Indeed, as Colin Mitchell has observed, Persian administrative prose evolved considerably between the turn of the fourteenth century and the end of the fifteenth century.⁴⁰ Whereas manuals of the Ilkhanid era tend to offer direct and unadorned prose, by the end of the fifteenth century a confident and more literary approach was embraced. So, at the outset of his secretarial manual from the mid-fourteenth century, Dastūr al-kātib, Nakhjavani rejects the earlier examples of Seljuq-era stylists, such as Rashid al-Din Vatvat and Baha' al-Din Baghdadi, for their antiquated approach, which was unresponsive to contemporary trends that favored a straightforward and direct prose.⁴¹ Instead, Nakhjavani offered precise and comprehensive direction on the formulation of the widest array of official documents and correspondence. The encyclopedic aspect of the manual was clearly appreciated by later generations even if its stylistic sensibility had become antiquated; Bayezid's library contains three separate copies of this work (219 {16}, 219 {17–18}, 220 {11}).

Mahmud Gavan's aforementioned two works demonstrate the stylistic direction of the Persian chancery in the fifteenth century. The first of these works, Riyāz al-inshā', is simply a prose collection of official and private correspondence produced by the pen of the great statesman. As with all of the works in this mold, its purpose was to offer its readers examples of fine prose upon which they might draw in their own compositions. In their full embrace of varied references and a willingness to playfully employ rhymed prose, Gavan's letters highlight stylistic developments in the Timurid period, which, by the turn of the sixteenth century, were also having an impact in Ottoman domains. Gavan's other work, Manāẓir al-inshā', underscores the more technical aspect of a secretary's craft. The work, which opens with extended discourses on the definition and attributes of composition (inshā'), contains samples of all of the titles of address and types of documents that a secretary would need to compose in the course of his official duties and private affairs.

The predominance of Persian in this subsection of the library is further underscored by the significant lacuna with respect to Arabic secretarial manuals. Whereas the library contains three copies of Nakhjavani's manual, not a single volume of the most famous Arabic manual from the fifteenth century, al-Qalqashandi's Ṣubḥ al-a'shā', is included in 'Atufi's list.⁴² While the exclusion may be accidental, it also speaks to the outsize status of Persian, especially its formulation in a late-Ilkhanid and Timurid mold, within the Ottoman palace library. Indeed, this prominence substantiates the point raised at the beginning of this piece, namely that the salient features of a sixteenth-century Ottoman Turkish idiom—both administrative and literary—are located more soundly in the fifteenth-century ecumenical Persian Timurid and Turkmen cultural environment that stretched from the Balkans to Central Asia, and not, as is often presumed, in the fifteenth-century Anatolian Turkish context.

This point is also demonstrated in the library's collection of secretarial accounting (siyāqat) manuals. The proper maintenance of revenue and expenditure accounts was a fundamental duty of secretaries, and many writers subsumed knowledge of these techniques within the larger category of secretarial prose writing. Nakhjavani, for instance, considered the knowledge of how to collect and record revenue ('ilm-i istīfā'-i māl) and bookkeeping (navīsandag, siyāqat) as components of prose composition (inshā'). Yet, even if 'Atufi distinguished siyāqat from inshā' in his ordering of the library's collection, he clearly endorsed their close relationship. The section (taṣnīf) heading indicates siyāqat works as distinct from inshā', even as titles pertaining to siyāqat are interspersed among the more numerous works concerning inshā'. The royal collection includes several works focused on secretarial accounting, all of which are products of Persephone administration from the fourteenth century. Modern scholars have long noted the importance of these works to the economic and administrative history of Anatolia in the Ilkhanid period, but their inclusion in the palace library suggests their lasting impact on Ottoman scribal culture as well.⁴³ Two of these works—Sa'ādāt-nāma (Bliss Book, 219 {2–3, 8}) by 'Ala-yi Tabrizi and Risāla-yi falakīya (The Falakian Epistle, 219 {9}, 220 {10}) by Abdallah bin Muhammad Mazandarani (fl. 1363)—are represented in multiple copies.⁴⁴ Indeed, the impact of these Ilkhanid siyāqat models can be observed in the strong parallels between them and Ottoman accounting registers produced at the turn of the sixteenth century, such as Īn'āmāt Defteri (Gift Register) in the last ten years of Bayezid's reign.⁴⁵

In broad terms, then, the collection of mostly Arabic and Persian prose and scribal works in the library reflects clearly the classic works and useful models available to Ottoman secretaries and stylists at the turn of the sixteenth century. With few exceptions, such works were composed in earlier centuries and constitute something of the accepted canon of prose writing in Arabic and Persian. Indeed, one of the striking features of this collection is the relative scarcity of some of the most celebrated stylists at the turn of the sixteenth century. Colin Mitchell has pointed to the Timurid cultural efflorescence of the late fifteenth century as a high watermark in the Persian inshā' tradition. To substantiate his point, he enumerates the great number of inshā' collections that were produced by men affiliated with Timurid chanceries in the fifteenth century.⁴⁶ The Ottoman library contains several of these works, including Yusuf Ahl's aforementioned Farā'id-i ghiyāsi and the prose collection of 'Abd al-Rahman Jami (222 {3–4}). Yet some of the most important works produced at the turn of the century are missing, most notably Husayn Va'iz Kashifi's Makhzan-i inshā' completed in Herat in 907. The absence of Kashifi's work speaks to the limitation of the collection, one that is understandable, however, given the proximity between the completion of Kashifi's work and the compilation of 'Atufi's inventory. For despite the Ottoman court's pronounced interest in Timurid literary offerings, books circulated slowly and unevenly. Kashifi's inshā' was completed just two years before 'Atufi produced the library book list; perhaps this was not enough time for the work to find its way to the Ottoman palace library. Prominent works of living scholars and statesmen frequently arrived as gifts at the Ottoman palace—Jami's Munsha'āt likely belongs in this category—but more often than not, works arrived in Ottoman lands through private channels, either with the arrival of foreign scholars or the return of Ottoman scholars after study and travel abroad.

Another contemporary booklist sheds some light on the nature of this circulation, especially as it pertains to prose collections. This list of the private collection of the Ottoman chief military judge Mü'eyyedzade 'Abd al-Rahman Efendi was compiled shortly after his death in 1516 and represents the judge's wide-ranging interests, from religious learning to history, poetry, astronomy, and many fields in between.⁴⁷ Significantly, the collection also mirrors the interests of the palace library. With respect to prose collections, Mü'eyyedzade's library, like the palace library, possessed a copy of Mahmud

Gavan's inshā' and generally demonstrates a marked interest in Persian literature and prose writing from the Timurid period.⁴⁸ Notably, Mü'eyyedzade's collection also includes the prose writing of the great Timurid historian, Sharaf al-Din 'Ali Yazdi (d. 1454), an apparent lacuna in the holdings of the palace library at the time of 'Atufi's work.⁴⁹ Yet, in contrast to the palace library, Mü'eyyedzade's collection also contains several prose collections of his peers and contemporaries at the Ottoman court. These include the Persian prose writing of Mawlana Muhammad Munshi, a secretary of the Aqqoyunlu chancery, who, after his capture by the Ottomans at Otlukbeli in 1473, spent the remainder of his career at the Ottoman court; and the prose collection of Idris Bidlisi, another Persian émigré, chronicler of the Ottoman dynasty, and advisor to Sultan Selim I on his eastern campaigns of 1514–17.⁵⁰ The inclusion of the prose works of these two men of Persian letters in the library of a top Ottoman scholar of Bayezid's reign further underscores the Timurid influence on Ottoman scribal culture that may be observed through an examination of the palace library in isolation. While it is certainly true that late-Ilkhanid and Timurid prose exercised a profound influence on Ottoman stylists in the fashioning of a distinctly imperial idiom, more temporally proximate Persian writers also had an impact. In light of Mü'eyyedzade's collection, it seems appropriate to conclude that the emergence of a hyperliterate Ottoman Turkish idiom was equally the consequence of a stylistic dialectic—shaped by the models of the past as reflected in the palace library—that nonetheless also unfolded between recent arrivals from Iran and their Ottoman interlocutors.

NOTES

1. Miscellanea documenti turchi, no. 250, Archivio di Stato di Venezia. The Venetian archives have preserved many official documents in Greek received from Ottoman sultans that predate 1529. There are a few pieces of correspondence in Greek after this date, but these were mostly produced by Ottoman judges whose jurisdictions bordered Venetian territory. None of these are from the sultan.

3. The Turkish materials of Lami'i Çelebi's collection have been published: Lami'i Çelebi, Münşeât-ı Lâmiî, ed. Hasan Ali Esir (Trabzon: Karadeniz Teknik Üniversitesi, 2006). Lami'i Çelebi's Persian letters are found only in manuscript copies of the work; see, for instance, Süleymaniye Kütüphanesi, Esad Efendi 3316, 3317.

The prevalence of these letter collections from scholars outside the chancery in the early sixteenth century would appear to nuance Christine Woodhead's observation of almost thirty years ago that personal letter collections emerge only in the seventeenth century with the work of stylists such as Nergisi (d. 1635) and Veysi (d. 1628): Christine Woodhead, "Ottoman İnşa and the Art of Letter-writing: Influences upon the Career of the Nişancı and Stylist Okçuzade (d. 1630)," Journal of Ottoman Studies 7–8 (1988): 143–59, at 145.

11. An exception might be made here for Ahmed-i Da'i's poetry. Christine Woodhead suggests that Ahmed-i Da'i's prose collection was well known in the sixteenth century on the basis of Sehi Beg's biographical remarks (Christine Woodhead, "From Scribe to Litterateur: The Career of a Sixteenth-Century Ottoman Katib," British Society for Middle East Studies Bulletin 9, no. 1 [1982]: 55–74, at 62). Ahmed-i Da'i was likely much more renowned for his poetry. 'Aşık Çelebi, whose biographical dictionary is more detailed and comprehensive, does not even include an entry for Ahmed-i Da'i and only mentions his name once in his introduction as an early example of a Turkish poet whose verse, in his own day, is still found among compendia and recited orally (nâmlarına olan qaşâ'idları mecmû'alarda meşûr ve efvâhda mezkûr): 'Aşık Çelebi, Meşâ'irü'ş-Şu'arâ: inceleme-metin, ed. TURKISH/TURKIC BOOKS OF POETRY, TURKISH AND PERSIAN LEXICOGRAPHY: THE POLITICS OF LANGUAGE UNDER BAYEZID II

The present essay discusses questions related to the politics of language in the Ottoman empire in general, and the role of Persian and Turkish in that polity in particular, exemplified by the books in Bayezid II's library, as listed in the inventory compiled by his librarian 'Atufi. The first part of the essay focuses on books of Turkish/Turkic poetry, which is followed by a discussion of Turkish lexicography and a number of other genres in Turkish and Turkic. Poetry in Turkish/Turkic has its own section in the inventory, although, as will be demonstrated, it can also be found in other sections. The second part of the essay discusses Persian lexicography. Lexicographic works, whether in Turkish or Persian, are registered by the learned librarian in a section on lexicography in general, which naturally consists mainly of Arabic lexicography.

PART I: THE POLITICS OF TURKISH IN THE LANDS OF RUM BETWEEN THE MID-FOURTEENTH AND EARLY SIXTEENTH CENTURIES

In 1350, Hoca Mes'ud, a prominent Turkish poet wielding his pen at the court of the Aydınids in western Anatolia, expressed a great deal of vernacular anxiety when composing a maşnavî, i.e., a narrative poem in couplets, in Turkish. Deeming the phonetic structure of this language unfit for the Arabo-Persian poetic metrical system, he recommended avoiding Turkish words in Turkish poetry as much as possible and using Persian and Arabic words instead:

Now please allow me to apologize:
Alas! The Turkish tongue is short breadthwise.

Should I compose verse but in Turkish pure,
it would be such that no tongue ever'd endure.
When masterfully mixed are tongue and speech,
Turkish's like when the salt the soup doth reach.
You should but Arabic and Persian words write, for when the Turkish tongue is versified, sometimes it fits the pattern, sometimes not,
clumsily slipping meter, rhythmwise not.
Too many faults the verse has, too much change!
In poetry, Turkish becomes too strange.
It has no words th'original to follow.
Compose your verse just like your heart will allow!
Sing in this tongue; the rules are all transgression:
no meter, no long vowels, no gemination.
If half your verse is not in Arabic,
the other half's in Persian and Turkic.
Compared to Arabic or to Persian,
Turkish is mud beside a pure fountain.
If you've the proper capability, sieve out the mud, preserve but purity.¹

By contrast, almost two and a half centuries later, sometime between 1592 and 1598/99, the brilliant and prolific litterateur, Mustafa 'Âli (d. 1600), expressed vernacular triumph in a veritable language manifesto for Ottoman Turkish in the preface to his Künhü'l-ahbâr (The Essence of History):

The astonishing language current in the state of Rum, composed of four languages [West Turkish, Chaghatay Turkic, Arabic, and Persian], is a pure gilded tongue, which, in the speech of the literati, seems more difficult than any of these. If one were to equate speaking Arabic with a religious obligation (farz), and the use of Persian with a sanctioned tradition (sünnet), then the speaking of a Turkish made up of these sweetnesses becomes a meritorious act (müstaḥabb), and, in the view of those eloquent in Turkish, the use of simple Turkish should be forbidden.²

The poet Hoca Mes'ud was looking to the centers of Islamic learning for Persian and Arabic models, and he found his own idiom clumsy in its capacity to catch up with them. While implicitly boasting that he still manages to pull off the feat of composing a narrative poem in Turkish despite the fact that he considers this idiom unwieldy in its adaptation of Arabo-Persian rules of poetry, his poem nonetheless displays his fascination with and submission to these two prestigious literary traditions. Hoca Mes'ud's patrons, the Aydinids, were presiding over a courtly culture that attempted to outdo other local courts in Anatolia by adopting Arabo-Persian cultural models as conveyed to them by the Seljuks and their overlords, the Ilkhanid Mongols, while simultaneously trying to reflect the ethos of these models to their Turkophone subjects. At the end of the sixteenth century, on the other hand, Mustafa 'Ali was writing not as a court litterateur but as a self-conscious bureaucrat working in the full-fledged, proud literary tradition of Ottoman Turkish. Inasmuch as he conceptualizes the Ottoman Turkish language as a summa of Anatolian Turkish, Chaghatay Turkic, Arabic, and Persian, Mustafa 'Ali expresses a political theology in which the Ottoman imperial enterprise is conceived as heir to the grand political, religious, and cultural traditions of high Islam on par with Persian and Arabic. 'Atufi's inventory provides very interesting insights on the transition between these two stages of the Turkish literary tradition.

This first part of the present essay is about the Turkish and Turkic books of poetry and lexicography in the library inventory (henceforth referred to simply as "the inventory") of Bayezid II (r. 1481–1512), prepared by the palace librarian 'Atufi. Straddling literary and cultural history, I address the symbolic and political functions of Turkish in the Ottoman imperial venture, from the second half of the fifteenth century through the early sixteenth century, i.e., during the respective reigns of Mehmed II (r. 1444–46, 1451–81) and Bayezid II. The paper takes as a premise that the inventory expresses the politics of the patronage of learning and of the literary arts during the respective reigns of the aforesaid rulers. While my focus is on poetry and lexicography, I will also touch on other genres inasmuch as they pertain to the discussion of literary language. Although the section of Turkish/Turkic poetry books in 'Atufi's inventory also includes historical narrative poetry, that subject is examined by other contributors to the present volume and is thus dealt with only cursorily here. In the first part, I give a general thematic and structural analysis of the distribution of Turkish/Turkic works in the inventory, followed by a discussion of issues involved in the identification of individual works, which are enumerated according to genre. In addition to the sections in 'Atufi's inventory that are dedicated to Turkish poetry and lexicography, I will also touch upon Turkish/Turkic works listed in other sections of the document, although they are discussed in greater detail by other contributors to the present volume.

The inventory contains approximately 200 titles in Turkish/Turkic. This may seem to be a small number compared to the more than 5,000 volumes in Arabic and Persian, the two prestige idioms in the Persianate Islamic world at the time. It is also disproportionately small if we compare it to the burgeoning Turkish literary output in the rest of the sixteenth century, which overshadowed the importance of Arabic and Persian after the 1590s in the Ottoman context. However, we should bear in mind that the Turkish literary tradition was much younger than the Persian and Arabic traditions. We should also compare the percentage of Turkish books in the library of Bayezid II to the number of vernacular-language works in contemporary Western royal libraries. Under the librarianship of the famous Bartolomeo Sacchi, known as "Platina," the librarian of Pope Sixtus IV (1471–84), the Vatican Library expanded to include about 3,500 volumes. Around the same time, the Corvinian Library of King Matthias of Hungary (r. 1458–90), the largest collection in the Christian world outside the Vatican at the time, had around 2,500 volumes; and the libraries of Henry VIII of England housed approximately 1,000 volumes after the sequestration of the holdings of English monasteries.³ Each of these libraries contained books almost exclusively written in Greek and Latin, i.e., the cosmopolitan languages of culture in the West during the Renaissance: the number of works in vernacular languages was probably minimal in the case of the Vatican, zero in the case of the Corvinian Library, and also relatively small in that of Henry VIII.

East of the Ottoman empire, the situation was no different. The number of Turkish books in Bayezid II's collection certainly surpassed the holdings in other libraries of contemporary Turkophone dynasties in the Islamic world, such as the Aqqoyunlu or the Mamluks. It probably equaled or even exceeded the number of Turkic books in the collection of Sultan Husayn Bayqara's (r. 1470–1506) court in Herat, although we have no comparable royal book lists from the Timurid realm.⁴ This is despite the significant patronage and ideological importance given to Turkic there during the so-called "Timurid Renaissance," primarily at the instigation of the prominent Maecenas and litterateur of Turkic, Mir 'Ali Shir Nava'i (d. 1501). Just as there was a change in the role of Turkish in the Ottoman empire, particularly in its relation to Arabic and Persian, so too the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries in the Latin West saw the growing importance of vernacular languages—e.g., German, French, English, Italian, Spanish—in relation to the main prestige idiom, Latin. Undoubtedly, there was a sizeable literary tradition in such vernaculars prior to the fifteenth century, and some of these languages had already started to fulfill administrative and religious functions much earlier. In this period, however, vernaculars began to expand into new domains and absorbed much of the vocabulary, genres, topoi, and other features of the prestige languages, i.e., Latin in the West, Persian and Arabic in the Ottoman empire. Indeed, Ottoman and European vernacularization were not only conterminous but also structurally similar processes.

One of the questions addressed in this essay is how to situate the compiling of the inventory by 'Atufi into this story of linguistic and literary vernacularization, a phenomenon that is closely connected to other broad historical processes such as early modern state building and confessionalization. Could the Ottomans have turned to Persian as the language of power, i.e., the language of administration and the chief idiom for religious and creative literary purposes, keeping their Turkish vernacular at a lower register? This is in fact what had happened in the case of most other dynasties in the era from the Seljuks to the Mongols, the Qaraqoyunlu, the Aqqoyunlu, even the Timurids to a great extent; and this would also occur in Safavid Iran and Mughal India between the sixteenth and the early eighteenth centuries. Each of these Turkophone dynasties headed a Turkic military and sponsored a Persophone bureaucracy. It should also be remarked that the expansion of Turkish into the domains hitherto reserved for Persian and Arabic was not even. In the Ottoman context, Arabic continued to be used at the madrasa, and it was reserved for fields like philosophy, theology, and the sciences. Turkish expanded primarily at the expense of Persian, which was the language of courtly adab culture, the dynasty, and Sufi mysticism.

The development of Turkish literary culture in Anatolia and the Balkans, however, stood in marked contrast to the development of Turkic literature under the other Turkophone regimes mentioned above. Before the region came under Ottoman dominion, Turkish had already been one of the languages of oral communication as well as literary expression at various Turkophone courts of the so-called beyliks (petty principalities that arose in the wake of declining Mongol and Seljuk control over Anatolia) and in Sufi circles. To what extent Ottoman Turkish culture, which became increasingly prominent after the mid-fifteenth century, and especially in the late sixteenth century, was a direct continuation of the traditions of fourteenth-century Anatolia remains a point of debate. As I will argue below, there seems to have been a shift in direction in the late fifteenth century in terms of the kind of Turkish literature patronized by the Ottoman elite, a process that came full circle by the late sixteenth century. The fact that the Ottomans ended up espousing Turkish as the language of culture and administration, i.e., "the language of power," to use Sheldon Pollock's phrase, arguably had as much to do with the political, social, and cultural context of the late fifteenth and sixteenth century in Ottoman-held territories as it did with the cultural capital Turkish had accumulated in the previous two centuries.⁵ In other words, I will also argue that the exponential increase in Turkish literary output in the latter half of the sixteenth century did not flow directly and organically from the literary traditions of the previous two centuries but was the result of new tastes and patronage networks under the imperial elite that took up key positions in the administration after the capture of Constantinople in 1453.

Indeed, this conquest of historic magnitude provided the Ottoman venture with a new symbolic meaning, an imperial consciousness of being the new Rome. The Ottomans' consequent political, military, ideological, and religious competition with Christian powers in the West and Muslim powers in the East also brought about cultural engagement and exchange.⁶ The imperial mission, the enormous increase of resources that accompanied conquest and revenues, the intensive transfer of knowledge between Ottoman territories and the regions to the east and west, together with the search for various ways to project power both internally and externally, were all key factors in the Ottoman rulers' patronage of learning and the arts. In addition, the most important key positions in the central administration were filled by a new palace slave elite (Christian converts to Islam known as the kul), and there was a hierarchical network of institutions of religious instruction for training new religious and administrative cadres. The Ottoman dynasty and the new Ottoman elite espoused a distinctive imperial mission that synthesized ancient and current Mediterranean symbols of rule, as well as Islamo-Persianate and Turco-Mongol ideals.⁷

The imperial mission that perpetuated such a complex heritage could not be expressed in a single language; it was a highly multilingual undertaking. As illustrated by 'Atufi's inventory, the majority of the sultan's book collection was in Arabic and Persian, and only a relatively small number of works were in Turkish/Turkic. Remarkably, however, most of the existing modern scholarship on Turkish literature is dedicated solely to the Turkish production of the Ottomans, either neglecting its relationship with Arabic and Persian entirely, or thinking about Turkish literature only in terms of the philological correspondence between Ottoman and Persian or Arabic works. Further, classical Orientalist scholarship, which is rife with decline theories about the Islamic world in general and the Ottoman empire in particular in the service of a Western colonizing narrative, maintained that the Ottoman project was of a secondary, derivative nature, and that Ottoman literary culture was at best a pale imitation of the grand traditions of Persian and Arabic.⁸ Much Turkish nationalist historiography, on the other hand, which arose in the wake of the paradigmatic Fuad Köprülü (d. 1966), emphasized the specifically Turkish character of Turkish literature, claiming it derived mainly from Central Asian origins.⁹ It would be futile to deny the importance of the relationship between Oghuz Turkish literature produced in Anatolia and other Turkish literary traditions that sprung up in Central and Inner Asia. However, the precise nature of this relationship is open to debate, and such a nationalist thesis fails to adequately consider the complexity of cultural dynamics, especially literary multilingualism, at Anatolian courts and among certain dervish communities, as the breeding ground for a Turkish literary idiom. Despite its shortcomings, this thesis calls attention to the fact that, by the early fourteenth century, the waning Seljuk or Ilkhanid courts were less capable of projecting political prestige or providing literary and artistic models at the beyliks of Anatolia. The nascent courts of these principalities engaged in cultural competition with each other, and thus sponsored literature and learning mainly in Arabic and Persian and, to a lesser degree, in Turkish. The courts of independent dynasties such as the Germiyanids, the Aydinids, or the Ottomans themselves, were therefore highly multilingual literary settings. Most recently, Selim Kuru and Sara Nur Yıldız have decried the fact that, despite the multilingualism of the cultural scene in fourteenth- to fifteenth-century Anatolia—which we can extend to the period under consideration here as well, i.e., to the late fifteenth into the early sixteenth century—most modern literary historiography is only concerned with the rise of a Turkish vernacular as the cultural-political expression of the Turkophone elite. Ironically, as Sara Nur Yıldız argues in her article about the literary culture patronized at the Aydinid court in West Anatolia (1308–1426), it was the increased availability of patronage to Persian and Arabic; the growing volume of literary output in these two languages; and the resultant need to convey such literary products to an audience unversed in Persian and Arabic that produced literary works in the Turkish vernacular. This analysis can be extended to the Ottomans as well.¹⁰ In other words, vernacularization may well have resulted from the multilingualism of the courtly context and the patronage available to literary production therein, rather than being the product of some putative, rising proto-nationalist consciousness on the part of the Ottoman elite in pursuit of pro-Turkish language policies. In short, more Persian and Arabic literary production triggered more Turkish literature. This is corroborated by the book list of the Ottoman scholar-statesman Mü'eyyedzade 'Abd al-Rahman Efendi's personal library from 922/1516, which contains approximately 2,000 items, including twenty to twenty-five entries in Turkish.¹¹ We may also speculate that since the new palace elite, the kul, largely came from the devşirme and had to be taught Turkish, it would have been impractical to also teach them Persian on a sufficiently advanced level to make everyday communication in Persian possible. In addition, knowledge of Turkish may well have been an identity marker for Turkophone Muslims and the kul, which further strengthened the position of Turkish. Perhaps even more importantly, the other Turkophone dynasties, such as the Aqqoyunlu and the Timurids, ruled regions with strong urban elites that perpetuated Iranian notions of authority, supported by language ideologies related to Persian. In the Ottoman realm, however, urban life was dominated by languages other than Turkish, such as Greek, Armenian, and Serbo-Croatian-Bosnian, with Turkish increasingly rising to prominence. In Ottoman lands, Persian literary culture was thus maintained primarily in court circles as part of adab and in dervish communities, and was strengthened at times by the influx of Persophone literati from the East.

DISTRIBUTION OF TURKISH/TURKIC BOOKS IN THE INVENTORY

The Turkish contents of the palace library inventory have been analyzed by İsmail Erünsal in a number of excellent articles.¹² What follows is a more thorough account of the Turkish works in the inventory accompanied by a cultural-historical analysis focused on issues such as the state, status, and cultural-political function of Turkish in the Ottoman empire from the mid-fifteenth through the very early sixteenth century, especially vis-à-vis the two prestige languages of the Islamic world, Arabic and Persian. I also discuss the significance of Turkish books for the Ottoman project, the possible collecting policies of the Ottoman court regarding Turkish books, and the function of such policies in relation to the Ottoman imperial enterprise.

As has already been indicated above, 'Atufi dedicates a special section of the inventory to Turkish and Turkic books of poetry. This is significant in and of itself, in that it demonstrates a high linguistic consciousness on his part, and suggests that he attached particular importance to works written in the Turkish vernacular. As 'Atufi points out in the Turkish preface to the inventory, it is only for works written in verse that he has linguistically separate sections for Arabic, Persian, and Turkish/Turkic, respectively, categorizing other works according to genre and subject matter. 'Atufi places every versified Turkish work under the category of Turkish divans, unless he considers a particular work to be highly significant or foundational for its genre, in which case he places it within the relevant discipline.¹³

As Erünsal also observes, 'Atufi faced a problem when a single volume contained multiple works written in different genres or languages.¹⁴ Indeed, in a number of cases, Turkish works appear alongside Persian or Arabic ones in the same volume. If a volume contains more than one work, 'Atufi categorizes it either under the subject that is the most dominant in the volume, or the subject that is the most important to him, or that might have attracted the most readers. When a Turkish work is found in a volume together with works in Arabic or Persian, that volume is never listed in the section on Turkish divans, which arguably indicates the lower rank of Turkish vis-à-vis the two prestige idioms. For example, both of the known divans of Qabuli (d. 1478), a member of the coterie of poets surrounding Bayezid II, include mostly Persian poems and only a handful in Turkish; 'Atufi places this work in the Persian poetry section. However, since we have no information about the chronology of Qabuli's poems, we should consider the possibility that Qabuli wrote poems in Turkish only later on in his life, or that his Turkish pieces simply may have been left out of the copy consulted by the learned cataloguer. In this case, it is also possible the manuscript of Qabuli's divan that 'Atufi registered in the inventory contained no Turkish poems at all.¹⁵ Another noteworthy example is a volume with heterogeneous contents, including Qutbüddinzade İzniki's (d. 1480) jurisprudential Mukaddima (Introduction), which the cataloguer lists among works on jurisprudence. 'Atufi thereby prioritizes Qutbüddinzade's jurisprudential work over the other works and genres represented in this volume: 'Aşık Paşa's (d. 1332) Ğaribnâme (The Book of the Sufi), a lengthy Sufi didactic poem; Elvan-i Shirazi's (d. after 1426) Turkish translation of Shabistari's (d. 1340) mystical treatise entitled Gulshan-i Rāz (The Rose Garden of Secrets); Şeyhoğlu Mustafa's (d. 1414?) romantic narrative poem Hurşidnâme (The Book of Hurşid); another, unidentifiable romantic narrative poem entitled Hüsrev ü Şîrîn; and an unknown work on astrology with the title Kitāb al-mulhama (Book of Inspiration by the Stars).¹⁶ In two cases, 'Atufi misidentifies works: he is apparently unaware that the Hibat al-ḥaqā'iq (The Gift of Truths), which he classifies as a work on Sufism, is the same as a Risāla (Treatise) written in "Mongolian," i.e., in the Uyghur script, which he places in the Turkish poetry section. Both titles, however, refer to the same didactic Sufi work better known as Atabat al-ḥaqā'iq (The Threshold of Realities) written by Ahmed Yükneci in the twelfth century in a literary idiom usually referred to as Qarakhanid Turkic.¹⁷ A similar confusion is evident in the case of the divan of Lutfi (d. 1462–63?), one copy of which is penned in Arabic and listed in the Anatolian/Ottoman Turkish poetry subsection, whereas four other copies of the work, which are written in the Uyghur script, are placed in the Chaghatay Turkic (Mughūliyya) subsection. It thus appears that 'Atufi may have been confused by the different scripts—and possibly the different titles—used for various manuscripts of the same work. In this case, he might have had in mind a different author named Lutfi, for example, the Anatolian Turkish poet with this penname who is included in 'Ömer b. Mezzid's (d. after 1437) collection of poetic paraphrases from 840/1437, to be mentioned below.¹⁸ Similar to 'Atufi's treatment of Persian and Arabic, it is only Turkish/Turkic poetry that gets a separate section in the inventory, whereas other Turkish/Turkic works are included in various other sections according to their subject matter, although they are very often placed close to each other within these other sections. There are also entries that cannot be identified at all (or only conjecturally), as well as ones where the author can be identified but the work is not placed in the Turkish poetry section for the above-mentioned reasons.

The section on Turkish/Turkic poetry lists eighty-six titles, which are distributed in eighty-three volumes. These are broken down into eight subsections according to genre and literary idiom. 'Atufi distinguishes between two Turkic/Turkish literary traditions: Anatolian Turkish, which is referred to in the inventory as Turkī, and Chaghatay Turkish or Chaghatay Turkic, which 'Atufi refers to as Mongolian (Mughūliyya) and Tatar (Tātārī), a distinction I will return to a little later. The subsections are the following:

1. Anatolian or Ottoman Turkish divans: nos. 1–14.
2. Works of Mir 'Ali Shir Nava'i: nos. 15–21.
3. "Mongolian" divans: nos. 22–26.
4. Anthologies of Turkish poetry: nos. 27–31.
5. Turkish didactic or narrative verse: nos. 32–58.
6. "Mongolian" didactic or narrative verse: nos. 59–62.
7. Turkish mawlıds (poems celebrating the birth of the Prophet) and lives of prophets: nos. 63–70.
8. Turkish historical narrative verse: nos. 71–82.

Anatolian or Ottoman Turkish Divans

The first subsection, Anatolian Turkish poetry, has fifteen titles, to which we should add thirteen further titles found in the sections on jurisprudence and Persian poetry. Of the books on this list and other pertinent Turkish poetry books, not one dates from before the fifteenth century and virtually all are related to the Ottoman court or the Ottoman elite from the reigns of Mehmed II and Bayezid II. It thus appears that many of the manuscripts were acquired through the personal connections of the sultans or their court personnel. It also appears that Mehmed II and Bayezid II and the palace elite surrounding them had little interest in the Turkish poetry of the preceding period, i.e., the literature practiced at the courts of the so-called beyliks of Anatolia.

There are very few books of courtly poetry from the fourteenth through the first half of the fifteenth century, or earlier. Such volumes in the inventory are the divans of Ahmed-i Da'i (d. after 1421) and Ahmedi (d. 1412–13). Ahmedi started out as an Aydınid and later became a Germiyanid protégé, but after the fall of the latter polity to Ottoman hands, he found patronage with the Ottoman sultan Mehmed I (r. 1413–21). One of the possible reasons that Ahmedi's divan was acquired by the palace library is the importance and prestige of the author's İskendernâme (Alexander Romance), a versified world history based on the Persian Shāhnāma tradition and Tabari's chronicle. It inserts early Ottoman history into a broader narrative of world history, which would later become a highly important subject for Ottoman manuscript illustration. Ahmedi was also noted as a poet of ghazals, as is attested by the inclusion of some of his lyrics in contemporary collections of naẓīres (parallel poems, imitations, paraphrases).¹⁹ Another of the few poets represented in the inventory from before the reign of Mehmed II is Safi, a painter from Bursa who was active during the reign of Murad II (r. 1421–51).²⁰

The new generation of poets at the courts of Mehmed II and Bayezid II is arguably best represented by Ahmed Pasha (d. 1496–97). As will be discussed below, he is one of the poets whose highly Persianized language—a style perhaps partly inspired by Hafiz's (d. ca. 1390) Persian poetry as well as Timurid models and most prominently by Nava'i—was important in the adaptation of Turkish to Arabo-Persian poetic meters and in the appropriation of the Arabic and Persian vocabulary of high-style verse.²¹ In Bursa, he held a veritable literary salon with poets like Hariri, Resmi, Miri, Remzi, Çağşırı, Şeyhi, and Hamidi, whose poetry was not compiled in divans.²² There were other poets, such as Melihi, who were also held in great esteem at the court at the time but whose poetry was not collected in divans and who are therefore not listed by 'Atufi.²³

We find divans and other books of poetry by prominent members of Sufi orders that were closely associated with the courts of Mehmed II or Bayezid II, such as Dede 'Ömer Revşeni (d. 1487), a shaykh of the Halveti order. This is unsurprising, given that the Halvetis were important supporters of Bayezid in his bid for the throne, associating with him already when he was governor of Amasya as a prince. We should mention Şeyh Vefa (d. 1491) as well, who belonged to the Zeyniyye Sufi order but was also affiliated with the Mevlevis. He founded a dervish lodge in Istanbul, an important hub of poets, which was funded by Mehmed II. Bayezid II augmented the lodge with a madrasa, despite the fact that Şeyh Vefa had supported Prince Cem (d. 1495), Bayezid II's brother and rival in the struggle for the throne. As for the divan of Şeyh Vefa, it is placed in the Persian poetry section of the inventory. It has two extant manuscripts, both of which carry the seal of Bayezid II. However, only one of them (Süleymaniye, Fatih 3899) contains Turkish poetry, in addition to poems in Arabic and Persian. Therefore it is more likely, although not entirely certain, that 'Atufi would have placed the other copy (Süleymaniye, Ayasofya 3925) among the Persian divans.²⁴ The literary activities of the dervish lodge founded by Şeyh Vefa likely influenced the Ottoman court in general and the palace library in particular, which should not be surprising, considering that 'Atufi's predecessor as royal librarian, Molla Lutfi (d. 1495), was one of Şeyh Vefa's disciples. 'Atufi's inventory contains two works by another disciple of Şeyh Vefa, Safa'i of Sinop (d. 1491): a historical narrative poem on the conquest of Lepanto and Methoni; and the poetic summary of the Sufi legacy of Şeyh Vefa, whom Safa'i succeeded as shaykh of the dervish lodge after Şeyh Vefa's death.²⁵ As will be discussed below, we can also find traces of literary activities in Turkish by members of the Bayramiyye order, such as Hamdullah Hamdi (d. 1503), the son of Mehmed II's spiritual advisor, Akşemseddin (d. 1459); and İbrahim Tennuri, another prominent Bayramiyye shaykh and Hamdullah Hamdi's mentor. Inasmuch as these Sufi traditions and networks were formative for Ottoman piety, the poets affiliated with them—or rather, the members in their ranks who wrote poetry—were instrumental in the formation of the literary and poetic manifestation of that piety, an increasing part of which was in Ottoman Turkish.

A few prominent circles of Ottoman poets who did not originally write for the central court are also represented in the inventory. One is the coterie of poets at the Konya princely court of Cem Sultan, son of Mehmed II, who is well-known for both his Persian and Turkish poetry and whose works are placed in the inventory's Persian poetry section.²⁶ One of the poets at his court was La'li (d. before 1538–39?), whose divan is listed in the section of Persian poetry. But La'li surely wrote in Turkish as well, as Sehi Beg (d. 1548) notes in his biographical entry on La'li, although we do not know whether the particular copy inventoried by 'Atufi also contained writing in Turkish.²⁷ In the Persian poetry section of the inventory is also the divan of Tali'i of Kastamonu (d. before 1548), who, together with Necati and Sun'i, was in the circle of Prince Mahmud (d. 1506), son of Bayezid II. After the prince's death, Tali'i filled various secretarial jobs, including secretary of the Janissary corps. The sources mention both his Persian and Turkish divans, but only the former is extant.²⁸

We should also mention Firaki, who is featured in the Persian section of the inventory, but whom Erünsal mentions as a Turkish poet. Erünsal probably has Firaki the Preacher (Va'iz) in mind, who, according to the biographical anthology of poets by Latifi (d. 1582), came from a line of shaykhs in Kütahya and was in the circle of Lami'i Çelebi (d. 1532). Little is known of Firaki's poetry, except for quotations of his work in Latifi and a ghazal in the Cāmi'ü'n-nezā'ir (Compendium of Paraphrase Poems), an anthology of poetic paraphrases compiled by Hacı Kemal of Eğridir in 1512.²⁹ The Persian poetry section of the inventory also lists the divan of Zati (?), although whether this refers to the prominent Ottoman Turkish poet of the first half of the sixteenth century is uncertain. As we do not know of Zati's (d. 1546) Persian poetry from any other source, it is difficult to ascertain whether his placement in the Persian section is due to oversight or whether the learned librarian had access to a copy of Zati's divan that might have contained at least some Persian. Of course, it is also possible that the Zati included in the Persian section of the inventory is a different versifier and not the famous Ottoman poet.³⁰

There are also entries of divans in the inventory that we cannot identify, such as that of a certain Mübarek and one 'Ali.³¹ The inventory lists two divans as belonging to an author named Haqiqi, one in the section of Persian poetry and another under Turkish books. We know of two poets by this name in the general time period: Jahanshah "Haqiqi" (d. 1467), a prominent ruler of the Turkmen Qaraqoyunlu dynasty that governed northwestern Iran, eastern Anatolia, and northeastern Iraq between 1375 and 1468, who was a bilingual poet of Turkic and Persian. Alternatively, this Haqiqi may be the Sufi poet Yusuf Haqiqi (d. 1488), although we do not know of his Persian poetry.³²

The period from the latter half of the fifteenth through the first half of the sixteenth century saw the migration of literati from the core Iranian lands to the Ottoman empire, many of them prompted by the promise of patronage and prestige.³³ Quite a few of these Persophone and, at least in a few cases, possibly bilingual, émigrés indulged in writing in Turkish on occasion, in addition to Persian. One such poet was Qabuli (d. 1478), whose divan, compiled in 880/1475, is included in the inventory. A poet of Iranian origin, Qabuli arrived in the Ottoman empire after a stint at the court of the Aqqoyunlu ruler Farrukh-siyar (r. 1465–1500). He first stayed at the court of Prince Bayezid, the future sultan, in Amasya and then tried his luck at the court of Mehmed II, apparently with little success. As indicated above, Qabuli had two divans, both of which contain a separate short section of Turkish poetry, and a few other Turkish poems of his have been preserved in anthologies.³⁴ Another Persian émigré was Basiri (d. 1534–35). Prior to Bayezid II, Basiri was patronized by the Aqqoyunlu prince Ughurlu Muhammad b. Uzun Hasan Bayandur (d. 1477) and Ya'qub b. Uzun Hasan (r. 1478–90). In approximately 1487, Basiri appeared at the court of Husayn Bayqara in Herat, where he became acquainted with Mir 'Ali Shir Nava'i and 'Abd al-Rahman Jami, both of whose poetry, according to Latifi, he brought to the Ottoman empire. Basiri arrived in the Ottoman empire as an envoy of the Aqqoyunlu ruler Ahmed Gövde (Göde, r. 1497–98), who was born from a daughter of Bayezid II, and entered the circles of such grandees and maecenases of the Ottoman elite as Tacizade Ca'fer Çelebi, Mü'eyyeddade 'Abd al-Rahman Çelebi, and Defterdar İskender Çelebi. Sources refer to both his Persian and Turkish divans, but only the former is extant with a section of Turkish inserted into it.³⁵ Another poet whose divan is listed in the Persian section of the inventory, although it contains Turkish pieces as well, is Hamidi (d. 1485). Born in Isfahan, he spent some time in Baku under the tutelage of the Shirvanshah, and also in Kastamonu under the Jandarid Isma'il Beg (r. 1443–61). Later Hamidi became a protégé of Mahmud Pasha (d. 1474), Mehmed II's grand vizier, who managed to pave the way for Hamidi to the sultan's court. However, Hamidi fell out of favor and had to be content with his appointment as guardian of the mausoleum of Murad I in Bursa.³⁶ Finally, we should mention Visali, a poet from Aydın who lived in Edirne during the reigns of Bayezid II and Selim I (r. 1512–20) and served as instructor for the ğilmân-ı hâşşa (palace pages).³⁷

There are still other poets whose divans are listed in the section of either the Persian or the Arabic divans. One is Kami, whose divan is placed in the Arabic poetry section. As 'Atufi provides no additional language markers, we might assume the work is in Arabic, although we should also consider the possibility that Kami's divan is only placed in the Arabic poetry section because the work with which it was bound, titled Kitāb dābiṭat ḥall mu'ammā (The Rules of Solving Riddles), is in Arabic. Erünsal believes this Kami is a Turkish poet, in all likelihood having in mind Kami of Kastamonu, who is mentioned by Sehi Beg together with a quote from Kami's Turkish poetry.³⁸ Similarly, Latifi claims that Le'ali, a poet from the reign of Mehmed II, who is also mentioned in the inventory, wrote in both Turkish and Persian, but only his Turkish divan is extant.³⁹

In certain cases, Erünsal boldly identifies works listed in other sections of the inventory as Turkish. Often, his reason for doing so is that the poets in question are mentioned in the sources along with a quotation of their poetry in Turkish. However, there are a number of instances where more caution is warranted. First, the fact that several of the works designated by Erünsal as Turkish are placed alongside Persian divans in 'Atufi's inventory should give us pause; more likely, these divans contained only, or at least mostly, Persian poetry. For instance, the Persian poetry section lists the autograph copy of Ahmed-i Da'i's divan without indication of any other language. Perhaps the entry refers to another, Persophone, Da'i, but more probably this is Ahmed-i Da'i's Persian divan, since Ahmed-i Da'i's Turkish divan features in the Turkish poetry section in the inventory.⁴⁰ Erünsal also states that the entry of Ahmed-i Da'i's Kitāb sittā (Six Books) is relevant for Turkish poetry; the entry is listed in the Persian poetry section of 'Atufi's inventory, however, and there is nothing to indicate that it refers to a work in Turkish.⁴¹ Another poet Erünsal identifies as Turkish but who was classified by 'Atufi as Persian is the renowned statesman-scholar of Mehmed II's court, Karamani Mehmed Pasha, who used the nom de plume "Nişani" (d. 1481). Today, his poetry in Turkish, Persian, and Arabic survives only in anthologies, since it was never collected in a comprehensive divan. Therefore, 'Atufi designates the copy of Nişani's works as a collection of ghazals and qasidas in the inventory, rather than a properly arranged divan. However, one wonders if this particular volume might have contained Turkish poetry, too.⁴²

The majority of these poets lived during the reign of either Mehmed II or Bayezid II, although some would flourish subsequently under Selim I. Most of the poets were closely associated with the imperial court, signifying that they did not come from the patronage networks at the courts of the beyliks or from the period before the Ottoman conquest of Istanbul. These poets were read by the new palace elite, which, as has been emphasized above, was dominated by the so-called kul, patronized by the Ottoman sultans and granted primacy by them beginning with Mehmed II. The preponderance in the inventory of poets coming from the circles around the courts of Mehmed II and Bayezid II also suggests the highly selective nature of the royal library collection when it came to Turkish books.

Eastern Turkic Works: The Poetry of Mir 'Ali Shir Nava'i

The section in the inventory listing Turkish/Turkic books of poetry contains three subsections dedicated to Eastern Turkic works, which is significant and shows the high prestige of the Timurid and, more broadly, Turco-Mongol cultural-political traditions. One of these subsections is devoted exclusively to works by Mir 'Ali Shir Nava'i (d. 1499), the most important figure of the Eastern or Chaghatay Turkic literary tradition, whose prestige was so enormous that 'Atufi felt it warranted a separate subsection. Nava'i made it his life's work to produce works in Turkic in almost every genre of the Persianate literary tradition. This was achievable only by thoroughly imbuing Chaghatay Turkic with features of Persian in terms of tropes, vocabulary, rhetoric, etc. The Eastern or Chaghatay Turkic literary tradition, especially in the form patronized by the Timurids, had a huge impact on the formation of the Ottoman tradition. All of the previous Turkic polities that ruled the Iranian-Islamic world since the beginning of the second millennium had abandoned their Turkic literary pursuits, if they had any, and espoused Persian as the language of culture. The Turco-Mongol Timurids, however, had a strong Mongol identity, and their cadre of Turkophone secretaries perpetuated Turkic literacy in the Arabic and the Uyghur scripts; and Sufi traditions in Central Asia were also producing literature in Turkic. As a language for cultural communication, Turkic received lavish support under the Timurids.⁴³ At the same time, being heirs to Irano-Islamic culture, they gave generous patronage to Persian literary pursuits as well, one of the best-known examples being ‘Abd al-Rahman Jami, who was invited to Istanbul by Mehmed II.

The impact of Timurid culture (and Turkic with it) on the Ottomans is symbolized in the well-known story preserved by Latifi. According to this account, Nava’i sent thirty-three ghazals as a gift to Bayezid II, who, as a gesture of competition and also acknowledgment of the cultural prestige of the Timurid poet, then ordered his aging poet laureate and former grand vizier Ahmed Paşa to write poetic replies or paraphrases (naẓīre) to each of the ghazals.⁴⁴ Indeed, the practice of writing Chaghatay Turkic poems in Nava’i’s style continued among Ottoman literati down to the nineteenth century. The transfer of Nava’i’s oeuvre was carried out at least in part by intellectuals flocking to the Ottoman court from Timurid lands, such as the aforementioned Basiri, who arrived from Husayn Bayqara’s court in Herat to Bayezid II in the early 1480s. Carrying recommendations from Nava’i and Jami, he ingratiated himself with the Ottoman ruler by presenting to him a copy of Nava’i’s divan.⁴⁵

The Nava’i entries in the inventory indicate not only the propaganda efforts of the Timurid court of Husayn Bayqara and the success of those efforts, but also show the extent to which the thoroughly Persianized Turkic literary idiom of Nava’i resonated with the tastes of the new Ottoman court elite. Moreover, the presence of so many copies of Nava’i’s divan in the inventory suggests that the prestige of the Eastern Turkic literary tradition in the eyes of its Ottoman enthusiasts had at least as much or perhaps even more to do with the personal efforts of Nava’i to impress Ottoman Istanbul as with the prestige of Timurid Herat more broadly. As illustrated by other essays in the present volume, ‘Atufi indicates that many Persian and Arabic works existed in multiple copies in Bayezid II’s library. It is telling for the status of Turkish in the collection that Nava’i’s divan is one of the few Turkish/Turkic works with multiple copies, and that of all such works registered in the inventory, Nava’i’s divan has the highest number of copies.

Interestingly, the inventory does not list Nava’i’s Kulliyāt or his complete works. Therefore, we can deduce that the Nava’i *Kulliyāt*s extant in Turkish manuscript holdings must be later acquisitions or commissions by the courts of subsequent sultans, perhaps Selim I, Süleyman (r. 1520–66), or even later rulers. As observed by Judith Pfeiffer in her essay in the present volume, another agent in the transfer of Nava’i’s oeuvre to the Ottoman court is the aforementioned Mü’eyyadzade, who had to flee from the Ottoman empire during the reign of Mehmed II. Mü’eyyadzade spent several years in Shiraz and was only invited back to Ottoman lands when Bayezid II succeeded to the throne in 1481.⁴⁶

Other Eastern Turkic Poetry (“Mongolian” Divans and Romances)

There are two other subsections consisting of books that the cataloguer regarded as coming from the Eastern Turkic literary tradition. In one of these subsections, we find Gada’i and Lutfi from the Timurid Chaghatay Turkic tradition. As with the works of Nava’i, ‘Atufi notes the language of these divans as “Mongolian” (al-mughūliyya). The designation probably permitted the cataloguer to distinguish between the Anatolian and Chaghatay Turkic traditions. Aside from this, ‘Atufi may have been inspired by the Uyghur scriptural traditions maintained by the Timurids; indeed, we know of Uyghur scribes occasionally working for the Ottomans. As has already been mentioned, the Uyghur script was part of the Chingisid heritage adhered to by the early Timurids. For the Ottomans, and for Mehmed II in particular, it seems the Uyghur script served mainly a ceremonial purpose, being used on occasion for the composition of yarlıghs (diplomas) or fethnāmes (declarations of conquest); and use of the Uyghur script is also attested in early fourteenth-century Anatolia, when it was still under Ilkhanid Mongol rule. We also know of poetry written by Ottomans that has survived in the Uyghur script. Sporadic use of the script fit Mehmed II’s broad cultural-political policies that were aimed to unify Mediterranean, Perso-Islamic, and nomadic conceptions of authority.⁴⁷

‘Atufi glosses two other works as al-mughūliyya (Mongolian) that linguists today would describe as coming from different traditions. One is the divan of Sayf-i Sarayī, who was a military slave active in Mamluk Egypt in the fourteenth century but originally came from Khwarazm.⁴⁸ Historical linguists classify the work as Mamluk Qipchaq. The other is the divan of one Mir

Hidayat, who may be the same Hidayat known from the court of Ya'qub the Aqqoyunlu and who left a divan written in Turkish. However, Hidayat's yet unpublished divan is not in Chaghatay, but in the third literary dialect of the Muslim Turkish tradition spoken in Iran, which we can call Azeri or Ajemi Turkic. For 'Atufi, both works were written in "Mongolian," i.e., in a literary idiom that he associated with the steppe traditions of the former Mongol empire, despite the fact that one of these works came from Egypt, and the other from western Iran. In this regard, we should also mention Qutb, who penned a Nizami paraphrase romance titled Khusraw u Shīrīn in Qipchaq Turkic between 727–40/1327–40 in Saray, the capital of the Golden Horde. The work was written for Cemile Khatun, the wife of Özbek Khan's (d. 1341) son Tini Beg (d. 1342). It is known to have survived in a single copy, executed by one Berke b. Baraqiz Qandud b. Edgü in Egypt in 785/1383.⁴⁹ The provenance of Sayf-i Saray's Mamluk Qipchaq work, the origin of the sole known copy of Mahmud Kashghari's Dīwān lughāt al-turk (Compendium of the Turkic Dialects) written in Qarakhanid Turkic and discussed further below, as well as the provenance of the copies of both, not to mention Qutb's Khusraw u Shīrīn, all point to Mamluk Egypt as another possible source of Eastern Turkic works for the Ottomans.⁵⁰

The other subsection of "Mongolian" verse comprises romances, such as the aforesaid Khusraw u Shīrīn by Qutb, Haydar Khwarizmi's (d. first half of the fifteenth century) Gul u Nawrūz (Gul and Navruz) from 1411, which is a paraphrase of Jalal-i Tabib's (d. 1395–96) Persian work, and Haydar Khwarizmi's version of Nizami's Makhzan al-asrār (The Treasury of Mysteries),⁵¹ which is in an anthology written in the Uyghur script, accompanied by interlinear transcription in the Arabic script. It can be safely said that this manuscript in the Uyghur script is identical with Ayasofya 4757 in the Süleymaniye Library, which was executed by the scribe 'Abd al-Razzaq Bakhshi in Istanbul in 884/1480. Remarkably, the volume also contains a copy of Ahmed Yükeki's Atabat al-ḥaqā'iq, another Qarakhanid Turkish work with Ottoman Turkish annotations, in Uyghur and Arabic script, which scholars date to the twelfth century.⁵² Finally, we should mention a translation of al-Busiri's (d. 1294) al-Burda (The Mantle), a famous panegyric on the Prophet Muhammad: Risālat tarjamat al-Burda bi-naẓm lugha tātār (Translation of the Burda in Verse in the Tatar Language).⁵³ The work is likely in Chaghatay (or Qipchaq) Turkic; the fact that 'Atufi designates its language as Tatar and not Mongolian might indicate that the work was written in the Arabic script but in a Turkic idiom that the cataloguer regarded as distinct from his own and perhaps also as different from the idiom used by Nava'i. This matter needs further research.

Anthologies of Turkish Poetry

The next subsection of Turkic/Turkish poetry is dedicated to anthologies. Four of the five are difficult to identify, but one may very well be 'Ömer b. Mezid's Mecmū'atü'n-neẓā'ir (Anthology of Paraphrase Poems) completed in 840/1437, which is a collection of "reply poems," i.e., paraphrases or imitations of other works. Compiled during the reign of Murad II, this collection contains 397 poems written by 84 poets from the fourteenth century and the first half of the fifteenth century. In all likelihood considered a rarity even during the reign of Bayezid II, the anthology survives in a single manuscript, and it is among the very few examples of poetry from before the second half of the fifteenth century in the inventory.⁵⁴ The divans of most poets included in it are no longer extant, and several of the poets are unlikely to have collected their poetry in a divan. Such an anthology serves both as an inventory of the past and as a source of poetic models for contemporary poets. A few years after 'Atufi composed the inventory, another important anthology of paraphrases was compiled by Hacı Kemal with the title Cāmi'ü'n-neẓā'ir (Compendium of Paraphrase Poems) in 918/1512. Containing 2,848 poems by 262 poets, this anthology is a quantum leap above 'Ömer Mezid's and may reflect the enormous increase in poets seeking patronage at the time, as indicated in a register of gifts from Bayezid's court, which will be discussed further below.⁵⁵

Of the four unidentifiable anthologies of poetry, one is listed as having been written "in the Turkic script," and the other, in "the old Turkic script." Both of these comments likely refer to the Uyghur script, although it is impossible to determine why 'Atufi does not use the term "Mongolian" here as he does in the case of other works written in the Uyghur script. No such anthology is known to be extant at the present time; however, the very existence of these two anthologies in the inventory attests to the breadth of Mehmed II's cultural program, which included an interest in the Chingisid heritage. At the same time, the fact that minimal information about these works is provided in the inventory—we can only glean that they are anthologies (mecmū'a) and that they are possibly written in the Uyghur script—might also hint at 'Atufi's unfamiliarity with this literary tradition, which he probably considered somewhat alien or exotic.

This list of poetry anthologies is significant. The rest of the sixteenth century saw a great deal of anthologizing, with the aforesaid two anthologies of Ottoman Turkish poetic paraphrases followed by two other monumental collections: that of Nazmi of Edirne written before 967/1559, and of Pervane b. 'Abd Allah, which was probably compiled in 968/1560-61. We should also mention the wave of Ottoman biographical anthologies of poets that was inspired by Timurid models, and that the first of these anthologies, from Sehi Beg to Latifi to 'Aşık Çelebi (d. 1572), explicitly cited 'Abd al-Rahman Jami's and Nava'i's biographical anthologies as models. 'Abd al-Rahman Jami and Nava'i were representatives of the widespread literary inventorying that occurred under the Timurids, who endeavored to sponsor the "codification and systematization of the tradition."⁵⁶

The importance of these collections is particularly well borne out if we consider that premodern anthologies of poetry are spaces for memory as well as models for future works. They are both personal, reflecting the anthologizer's particular taste, and potentially communal, serving a whole "textual community," to use Brian Stock's phrase, i.e., a network of people with varying degrees of literacy who might either access a certain text directly by reading it, or indirectly, by listening to its recitation.⁵⁷

Turkish Didactic and Narrative Verse: Maṣnavīs

The next subsection, which includes works of advice and narrative poetry, most of them maṣnavīs, is the largest one in the entire section on Turkish poetry, with 29 titles, a number complemented by titles in other sections of the inventory. Maṣnavī is not a genre but a poetic form consisting of poems written in couplets. Lyric poetry is rarely written in maṣnavī form, which is usually reserved for subject matter also contained in other sections of the inventory: religious didactics, versified biographies of the Prophet, and romances written primarily in the fourteenth to fifteenth century under the inspiration of Persian classical courtly adab.

One such romance is the quasi-historical İskender-nāme (Alexander Romance), which may well be Ahmedi's famous İskendernāme mentioned above, or an unidentified work titled Şāhinşāhnāme (Book of the King of Kings), which is described as a chronicle.⁵⁸ The section of the inventory on biography and history lists another work under this title, which is said to have been translated from Greek, but it is difficult to tell whether this is also Ahmedi's work or a prose İskendernāme.⁵⁹ Of the very rich romance poetry from the fourteenth to the first half of the fifteenth century, there are only a handful of examples represented in the inventory, such as Hoca Mes'ud's Süheyl ü Nevbahār, written in 1350 and quoted at the beginning of this essay; the Ḥurşid ve Farahşād by Şeyhoğlu Mustafa (d. 1414?); the Hümā ve Hümāyün by Cemali (d. ca. 1512), a poet likely from Bursa or Karaman who started his career during the reign of Murad II and lived through the reign of Bayezid II, enjoying the patronage of such Ottoman grandees as Çandarlı Halil Pasha (d. 1453) and Mahmud Pasha, both grand viziers under Mehmed II. Cemali dedicated his Hüma ve Hümāyün to Murad II in 850/1446. Also listed in this subsection is the Hüsrev ü Şirîn, which can be attributed to either Fahri (b. after 1318), who dedicated his version of the story to the Aydınid 'İsa Beg in 768/1367; Tutmacı, who wrote his version, titled Gül ü Hüsrev and based on 'Attar's Persian Khusrawnāma (Book of Khusraw), in 808/1406; or Şeyhi (d. after 1429), who penned his work sometime between 1421 and 1430, dedicating it to Murad II.⁶⁰ Another work represented in this subsection of Turkish poetry is the Mihr ü Müşterî, which can be attributed to either Hassan, who wrote his version in 835/1431-32; or to Müniri İbrahim Çelebi (d. 1421), who authored his in 892/1487, both versions being the Turkish renditions of 'Assar-i Tabrizi's (d. 1377) Persian narrative poem.⁶¹ Other narrative romances in this subsection include a work titled Bülbül-nāme (Book of the Nightingale) and a certain Belayi's Tercüme-yi kıssa-yi Leylā ve Mecnūn-i Niẓāmī (Translation of Nizami's Leylā and Mecnūn), neither of which, however, can be identified at present.⁶²

Remarkably, there is only a single allegorical romance from the time of Mehmed II and Bayezid II in the inventory. This is likely Hamdullah Hamdi's (d. 1503) Uşşāknāme (Book of Lovers), which is probably identical with his Tuḥfetü'l-üşşāk (Gift of Lovers), one of the books of his khamṣa (quintet of versified romances). Hamdullah Hamdi was closely associated with the court, at least for a time, because his father, Akşemseddin (d. 1459), a shaykh of the Bayramiyye dervish order, was a tutor and spiritual guide to Mehmed II.⁶³ There is another narrative poem in this subsection titled Kışsa-yi Ḥamza (The Story of Hamza), which is probably about the legendary exploits of the Prophet's paternal uncle. We cannot as yet identify it, however, because the known works bearing the title Ḥamzanāme (The Book of Hamza) are in prose, whereas this particular one is in verse.⁶⁴ Also listed here is the aforementioned Ahmed-i Da'i's (d. after 1421) Çengnāme (Book of the Harp) or Uşşāknāme (Book of Lovers) written in 808/1405.⁶⁵

As has been indicated above, the inventory lists only a small fraction of the plethora of Turkish romances written in the fourteenth through the first half of the fifteenth century, which was a veritable golden age of the genre.⁶⁶ On the basis of 'Atufi's inventory alone, one might get the impression that the Ottoman court under Mehmed II and Bayezid II was turning away from the court culture of the fourteenth through the first half of the fifteenth century. If the court was not redefining its tastes, it certainly sponsored new authors instead of reading the Turkish narrative poetic output of the preceding two centuries. This seems to suggest that there was as yet no established literary canon to draw on, which would have made such a transition easier. The lack of a set Ottoman Turkish literary canon is also demonstrated by the fact that, in contrast with many a work written in Arabic or Persian, very few works in Turkish are recorded by 'Atufi as having multiple copies.

Since verse is a mnemonic device, some of the Turkish *maṣnavī*s in the inventory were written in this form purely for religious didactic purposes, likely in the context of the madrasa. Such works are the otherwise unknown Risāla fī aḥkām al-khusūf wa-al-kusūf (Treatise on the Rules of Prayer after Solar and Lunar Eclipse);⁶⁷ the Tarjumat matn al-'aqā'id bi-al-turkiyya al-manzūma fī 'ilm al-kalām (Versified Translation of the Tenets of Theology into Turkish),⁶⁸ probably a versified catechism; and the Durj al-naṣā'ih li-'Abd al-Raḥīm (Casket of Advice for 'Abd al-Rahim, or Casket of Advice by 'Abd al-Rahim), which are both anonymous and non-extant;⁶⁹ Hisari's (d. after 1500) Tuḥfetü'l-mü'min (Gift for the Believer), a work from 906/1500 about the fundamental tenets of the faith and orthopraxy interspersed with didactic stories;⁷⁰ or the İbret-nāme (Book of Admonition) by Yetimi of Germiyan (d. 1378), which is in fact not a maṣnavī but a mono-rhymed narrative poem of advice about death in an eschatological framework. Remarkably, both Hisari and Yetimi's works are written in what linguists today call Old Anatolian Turkish, which indicates that their authors addressed them to a popular audience.⁷¹ Also in the vein of popular religion are two works bundled together in the same volume, which are versified biographies of the Prophet: Cefayi's Daḳāyiku'l-ḥaḳāyik (Fine Points of the Truths) from 1484, an anonymous Siyerü'n-Nebi (Life of the Prophet), perhaps identical with Yazıcıoğlu Mehmed's (d. 1451) work (about which see below), and an otherwise also unknown description of Mecca titled Risāla fī faḍl Makka sharāfahā Allāhu ta'ālā (Treatise on the Virtuosity of Mecca, May God Most High Honor It).⁷² The subsection on the nativity of the Prophet Muhammad includes a lengthy, two-volume poetic telling of his life, and a legendary versified biography of Joseph, based on the Qur'an.⁷³

As has already been noted above, certain Sufi networks were also influential at the court, which is attested by their output of poetic didacticism in Turkish as listed in 'Atufi's inventory. A number of manuscripts present introductions to the Sufi path, such as the Sāzü'l-irfān (The Long-Necked Lute of Gnosis) written by the aforementioned shaykh of the Zeyniyye order, Şeyh Vefa, which is a collection of didactic Sufi poetry;⁷⁴ the Kitāb-i tercüme-yi vaṣāyā-yi Şeyh Vefā (Book of Translation of Şeyh Vefa's Last Wills) by Şeyh Vefa's disciple, Safa'i of Sinop, mentioned above;⁷⁵ a volume titled Manzūmāt (Verses) by Dede 'Ömer Revşeni, likely a collection that includes his Çobānnāme (Book of the Shepherd, 880/1475-76) and Neynāme (Book of the Lute), which are two partial paraphrases of Rumi's Maṣnavī, as well as his Miskinnāme (Book of Misery), Ḳalemnāme (Book of the Pen), and Silsilenāme (Book of the Chain of Transmission);⁷⁶ the Bayrami shaykh İbrahim Tennuri's Gülzâr-i ma'nevî (Spiritual Rose Garden), which he dedicated to Mehmed II in 1453;⁷⁷ and Meşnevîyât (Poems Written in Couplets) by a prominent member of the Bayramiyye dervish order, Akbıyık Sultan (d. 1455–56, or perhaps soon after 1481), which are probably identical with his Hikâyât-i Nây (Stories of the Flute) and Hikâyât-i Şemsü'd-Dîn (Stories of Şemsü'd-Dîn).⁷⁸ There are three works of popular Sufism about which we know nothing other than that they are probably didactic works about the mystical path: the Kitâb al-irşād bi-al-turkiyya al-manzûma fî al-taşawwuf (Book of Guidance in Turkish Verse), Risâla turkiyya manzûma fî al-taşawwuf (Versified Treatise in Turkish on Sufism), and the Aṭwâr al-qalb (The Modes of the Heart).⁷⁹ Aside from its author, we know little else about the abovementioned Visali's Risâlat manzûmât (An Epistle of Verses).⁸⁰

Indeed, Sufi didactics, along with the mawlıds and the few Turkish works on Islamic theology and jurisprudence in the inventory, demonstrate the religiously contested nature of the nascent Turkish literary canon and Ottoman vernacular piety. Thus, it is not surprising that poets associated with mystical dervish orders are prominently represented in Bayezid II's library, since Sufi popular piety had always been an important factor in the production of Islamic literature in vernaculars.

Turkish Mawlıds

A separate subsection is dedicated to mawlıds, i.e., panegyric poems celebrating the Prophet Muhammad's nativity, telling his biography, and praising his qualities and miracles. The genre is closely associated with the public celebrations of this anniversary; indeed, the most popular mawlıds were recited at the court and even in the mosque. In this subsection of the inventory is the first known Ottoman version of the genre, Kerimi's İrşād (Guidance) from 863/1458.⁸¹ We can also identify in this subsection Müniri's Sîyer-i Nebî (Life of the Prophet), a versified biography of Muhammad that includes a section on the Prophet's birth, which might be why 'Atufi inserts it among the mawlıds.⁸² It may be surmised that one of the yet unidentifiable Turkish mawlıds in 'Atufi's inventory is Süleyman Çelebi's (d. 1421) celebrated example of the genre from 812/1409, titled Vesîletü'n-necât

(The Way to Salvation), but this cannot be verified.⁸³ It is also possible that this subsection of the inventory (or the previous one) contains Yazıcıoğlu Mehmed's Muḥammediyye, a monumental and extremely popular life of the Prophet complete with further information about the faith including Paradise and Hell, the Last Judgment, the angels, prophets, etc., written in 853/1449. As argued by Carlos Grenier, the Ottoman Turkish representatives of this genre in the fifteenth century should be read against the background of religious polemics with Christian communities, and the need to consolidate Muslims' personal attachment to their faith and thus strengthen communal identity and confessional boundaries.⁸⁴

Turkish Historical Narrative Verse

The section on Turkish poetry ends with eleven historical narrative poems, five of them detailing events connected to the reign of Mehmed II, four pertaining to the reign of Bayezid II, and two hitherto unidentified epic poems that cover the entire history of the Ottoman dynasty up to Bayezid II,⁸⁵ which are probably Kemal's (d. after 1490) Selâṭinnâme (Book of Sultans), a versified telling of Ottoman history from its beginnings to Bayezid II's reign, and a work celebrating Bayezid II's conquest of Lepanto and Methoni in 1500, written by the already mentioned Safa'i (d. 1521).⁸⁶ The number of historical narrative poems in the period is significant, considering that there had been no such epics since Ahmedî's İskendernâme. If our identification is correct, the latter work by Ahmedî features among the poetic romances listed above, although it also has a chapter on early Ottoman history inserted within the larger framework of Islamo-Persianate history. Since these historical epics are not listed in the section on romances or in the large thematic section of history and biography, it is clear that 'Atufi differentiated them from the romance literature and chronicles that arose in imitation of Persian models. The emergence of historical verse epics during the time of Mehmed II, their continuation under Bayezid II, and the interest in them at the palace as evidenced by 'Atufi's inventory, all suggest that the Ottoman elite were concerned to project a historical image on the popular level. This is in keeping with the interest of the Ottoman elite in the high genre of historiography in general and its vernacular Turkish rendition in particular, which we can see in the Turkish prose chronicles included in the inventory.

Not only does 'Atufi's inventory attest to the production of Turkish verse histories, but it also lists a cluster of eight versified histories in Persian, which are included in the Persian poetry section. Erünsal identifies these as being written in Turkish, but the fact that they are in the Persian poetry section, most of them without an additional language marker, makes his designation unlikely.⁸⁷ Although we are yet unable to identify these works, they are part of the tradition of Persian history writing at the Ottoman court that started under Mehmed II and continued for one and a half centuries, ending during the reign of Mehmed III (r. 1595–1603).⁸⁸

Indeed, the Ottoman court showed an increasing interest in sponsoring the writing of history in both Persian and Turkish. One can think of such major works as Uzun Firdevsi's (d. after 1512) Süleymānnāme, or Kemalpaşazade's paradigmatic history of the Ottoman dynasty in Ottoman Turkish, which was commissioned by Bayezid II at the recommendation of Mü'eyyedzade. The latter work was clearly and explicitly modeled on the highly ornate chancery or epistolary prose style of Idris-i Bitlisi's Persian Hasht Bihisht (Eight Paradises). Neither work can be found in 'Atufi's inventory, as both were completed after its compilation.⁸⁹ This subject is dealt with more extensively by Cornell H. Fleischer and İbrahim Şahin Kaya in the present volume. Suffice it to say that there was a clear demand for historiography at the court; according to Halil İnalcık, Bayezid II used these written histories strategically to boost his legitimacy over against his brother Cem.⁹⁰

TURKISH LEXICOGRAPHY

The inventory also contains works on lexicography and grammar. Most of them treat Arabic, fewer deal with Persian, and only a handful treat Turkish. Several of the lexicographical works that utilize Turkish would have served practical language learning purposes and are actually aids to facilitate the study of Arabic and Persian. This is certainly true of most of the lexicography produced prior to the sixteenth century. However, as we will see below, 'Atufi's inventory reveals an interest in Turkish as a subject of study in its own right, too. In the present state of research, it is impossible to fully identify all the Turkish lexicographical items in the inventory, which makes the following observations about them preliminary. The primary intended audience for such lexicographical compilations likely included members of the chancery and madrasa novices, but in fact, such works could have attracted readers from other literate circles and strata as well.⁹¹

Examples in which Turkish is used for the instruction of Arabic include two copies of al-Zamakhshari's (d. 1144) practical Arabic glossary, the Muqaddimat al-adab (Introduction to Literature) translated into Persian and Turkish probably in an interlinear fashion. As is also attested by the inventory, many copies of al-Zamakhshari's work differ in terms of the language of the interlinear translations that accompany the Arabic original, some of these translations being in Persian, Turkish/Turkic, or even Latin (al-afranjiyya).⁹² As suggested by the provenance and number of its existing copies, al-Zamakhshari's work became a staple glossary for the study of Arabic already in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries in the Khwarazmian territories of the Golden Horde.⁹³

'Atufi lists the Tuhfetü'l-hādiye (Gift of the Rod), also known as Risāle-i (or Kitāb-i) dānisten (Treatise on [or Book of] Knowledge, 294 {6}) from its first entry, which is a Persian-Turkish glossary and grammatical essay written by Muhammed b. Hacı İlyas before 1460.⁹⁴ Finally, the inventory lists Lutfullah Halimi's (d. end of fifteenth century) Muṣarriḥat al-asmā' (Explanation of Nouns) dated 872/1467–68, a glossary of names selected from al-Jawhari's (d. ca. 1007–10) Şihāḥ al-'arabiyya (Correct Arabic), Ibn Durayd's (d. 933) Jamhara fi al-lugha (Collection of the Language), and Ibn Faris's (d. 1004) Mujmal al-lugha (Compendium of the Language), accompanied by—probably interlinear—translations in Turkish and Persian. Halimi served at the court of Mehmed II, and was a protégé of Mahmud Pasha (d. 1474).⁹⁵ Remarkably, Halimi's better-known and more substantial work, a Persian-Turkish rhyming glossary titled Baḥr al-gharā'ib (Sea of Curiosities) and composed in 850/1446, cannot be found in the inventory or at least not under this title; neither does 'Atufi mention the shortened version of this work, known under the title Luġat-i Ḥalīmī.⁹⁶ Grammatical instruction is also the subject of two additional works enumerated by 'Atufi, an otherwise unknown trilingual (Arabic-Persian-Turkish) verse treatise, and a list of Arabic conjugations accompanied by Turkish translations.⁹⁷

There are surprising items, too. We can find in the inventory the first volume of Mahmud Kashgari's celebrated Dīwān lughāt al-turk (Compendium of the Turkic Dialects), a Qarakhanid Turkic-Arabic dictionary, a monumental compendium from the eleventh century dedicated to the language spoken in East Turkestan under the Qarakhanids. Based on the vocabulary of the Qarakhanids' aristocratic tribal culture in East Turkestan and dedicated to the Abbasid caliph al-Muqtadi (r. 1075–94), Kashgari's work is one of the few surviving monuments of a literary tradition that was discontinued. The lexicon survives in a unique manuscript, which is likely based on the author's own manuscript. It is preserved today in Millet Genel Kütüphanesi, and was copied in 664/1266 in Damascus, probably as an appeal to the Mamluks' interest in their own cultural heritage; it may also represent an endeavor on the part of local Syrian scholars to integrate their overlords into the Muslim intellectual universe. 'Atufi designates the copy listed in his inventory as only the first volume of Kashgari's work, and thus, it probably cannot be identical with the single-volume full copy extant today. Nevertheless, the provenance of the extant manuscript might be taken to suggest that the copy mentioned in the inventory also comes from Mamluk Egypt or Syria.⁹⁸ Be that as it may, the presence of such a recherché item in Bayezid II's library speaks to a heightened interest in scholarly, linguistic treatments of Turkish at the Ottoman court, signifying the presence of ideologies which strengthened the position of that language vis-à-vis Arabic and Persian.

Given the multilingual context of the empire at large and the palace in particular, it is not surprising that Turkish was also used as a medium to learn languages associated with non-Muslim communities. One such example of this is an otherwise unknown treatise on the Greek language, which is most likely a Greek word-list with interlinear Turkish translations.⁹⁹

MISSING WORKS IN TURKISH

Having briefly discussed the Turkish poetry that can be found in the inventory, now it is time to consider what cannot be found in it. Of course, every library has items that are missing from it for idiosyncratic reasons, such as oversight, the personal taste of the librarian or its patrons, unavailability of funds for the development of the collection, the personal and intellectual networks of those involved in its development, or sheer happenstance. However, in the case of Bayezid II's library as reflected in 'Atufi's inventory, there are certain gaps that may have been intentional or ideologically motivated.

İsmail Erünsal published the contents of an În'âmât Defteri (Register of Rewards), which includes, among others, the names of poets and other rewardees who received gifts, clothes, or money for the poetry they presented to Bayezid II between 10 Muharram 909/July 15, 1503 and 27 Dhu'l-hijja 917/March 26, 1512. Hence, it starts right after 'Atufi's library inventory was compiled and ends close to the sultan's death.¹⁰⁰ Of the names of the almost one hundred poets mentioned in this register as having received gifts, there are a handful of professional poets; but only six of these are mentioned by 'Atufi: Le'ali, Basiri, Visali, Zati, and Hamdi (although, as has been indicated above, the inclusion of the latter two in the inventory is not entirely certain). The inventory does not even contain a reference to Necati (d. 1509) or Revani (d. 1523–24), the two most celebrated Turkophone poets of the age, or the woman poet Mihri Hatun (d. after 1512), whose career roughly corresponds to Bayezid II's reign (she was based in Amasya, where Bayezid had been a governor before he succeeded to the throne, and where his son Ahmed followed him).¹⁰¹ The work of these poets may have been included in some of the aforesaid anthologies, but there is no reference to their divans. It is probable that their divans were collected at a later time; thus, the inventory seems to have been compiled when there was no systematic patronage for Turkish poetry at the court, or at least that patronage was not strong enough to be reflected in the commissioning of divan copies. As we have intimated above, the inventory does not do justice to the huge number of works, mainly narrative poetry, translated during the fourteenth century (primarily from Persian), or to the rich mawlid tradition.

The inventory has notable lacunae in terms of Turkish lexicography, too. Today, we have nineteen extant Persian-Turkish rhyming and prose dictionaries that were compiled in Anatolia prior to the composition of the inventory, whereas 'Atufi mentions only two works by Hacı İlyas.¹⁰² We find no copies of such well-known lexicographic works as 'Abd al-Latif b. Melek (Firişte)'s versified Qur'an glossary, Luğat-i Firişte (Glossary of Firişte), from 795/1392, or the prose Qur'an glossary, Luğat-i qānūn-i ilāhī (Glossary of the Divine Canon), written by his son 'Abd al-Majid in 854/1450.¹⁰³ It is perhaps the hurūfī affinities of the latter that made his work undesirable in Bayezid II's library, but the matter needs further research.

But perhaps we should not be surprised by this state of affairs. A more solid and extensive lexicographic literature arose to fulfill two fundamental functions in the Ottoman context, one practical and another symbolic. As for the practical function of Turkish lexicography, the teaching of Turkish to the kul likely did not take place in a classroom setting. State slaves acquired through the child levy system often learned Turkish as young people through their exposure to a Turkish-speaking environment, whereas at the palace school, teachers taught Turkish to royal pages probably through oral methods in combination with reading basic texts.¹⁰⁴ As for the symbolic function, a solid Turkish lexicographic tradition demonstrates the power and high status of the language concerned, i.e., it is indicative of a sufficiently prestigious literary tradition. On the other hand, the grammatical categories used in Turkish/Turkic lexicography were derived from the well-established Arabic lexicography, which also informed the Persian lexicographic tradition. Kashghari's Compendium, which was produced in the early twelfth century, reflects the background of the author, as he carried on the aristocratic pre-Islamic traditions of the freshly converted Oghuz and other Turkic tribes. This work is based on the Arabic grammatical tradition, reflecting its categories and patterns of arrangement. In the case of Turkish lexicography, most works are study aids, facilitating the reading of literature in the prestige languages. However, their very presence in the inventory suggests an important shift in the language ideologies regarding the status and use of Turkish under the Ottomans. That is, they suggest that Turkish was now seen as a necessary vehicle for understanding high culture.

This view is also confirmed by works dedicated to the discussion of Turkish. There are four such works in the inventory contained in two separate volumes. One of the volumes is almost certainly the one entitled Jāmi' al-lughāt (Collection of Languages) copied in 870/1466 by Sirac b. Tayyib b. Ahmed, secretary at the law court of Edirne, to be discussed in more detail in the section on Persian lexicographical anthologies. This collection of glossaries and grammatical treatises contains a discussion of the Turkish language intended for a learned audience, or at least one skilled in Persian and Arabic. It is titled Kitāb al-lughā al-turkiyya al-mutarjam bi-al-fārisiyya 'alā tartīb al-ḥurūf wa-al-ḥarakāt (Book in Persian on the Turkish Language Arranged in an Alphabetical Order and according to Vowel Signs), which was composed by the compiler of the anthology, who intended his work for Persophones interested in Turkish.¹⁰⁵ The other two items in the inventory are more elusive, and I have been unable to identify the volume in which they are included. One of these two is a colligatum of eleven grammatical treatises, some of which are also contained in the volume just mentioned (Kitāb al-lughā al-turkiyya al-mutarjam bi-al-fārisiyya 'alā tartīb al-ḥurūf wa-al-ḥarakāt). Most relevant for our discussion of Turkish lexicography here are two treatises, one in Arabic and another one in Persian, about the Turkish language, respectively titled Kitāb al-lughā al-turkiyya al-mutarjam bi-al-'arabiyya (A Book on the Turkish Language Translated into Arabic) and Kitāb al-lughā al-turkiyya al-mutarjam bi-al-fārisiyya (A Book on the Turkish Language Translated into Persian).¹⁰⁶ Unfortunately, we do not know more about these works, but the titles indicate that there was some level of scholarly interest in the study of Turkish at the Ottoman court, regardless of whether these books came from outside the Ottoman realm or were produced within it.

The lacunae in Turkish books of poetry and lexicography in Bayezid II's library are surprising, considering the significant Turkish literary production of the fourteenth and the first half of the fifteenth century. It is even more surprising when we observe the quantum leap this tradition underwent in every genre throughout the rest of the sixteenth century. One has the impression that 'Atufi's inventory reflects a transition in the interests of the court with regard to Turkish literary production. Or we might speculate that the very compilation of the inventory signals an upsurge in the patronage of arts and literature, which would have included Turkish works as well. It is even possible that it was these very gaps in the library that prompted Bayezid II and the Ottoman elite to give more patronage to Turkish literary activities. The prominence of Turkic products from Timurid lands and, most importantly, from Mir 'Ali Shir Nava'i, must also have inspired the Ottoman elite to sponsor more Turkish works.

FURTHER GENRES AND SUBJECTS IN TURKISH

As has been indicated above, an important reason for the vigor of the Turkish literary tradition at the Ottoman court in the early sixteenth century is that Turkish was used in almost every genre of the Perso-Islamic literary tradition, both in popular genres and in higher registers. While it was poetry that was most extensively committed to writing (especially poetry of the court and poetry with a Sufi bent), prose genres in other fields are also visible in the inventory. Of course, the number of such works is dwarfed by the deluge of Turkish literary production from the rest of the sixteenth century and onward, a phenomenon connected to the process of Ottoman confessionalization, i.e., the association of Ottoman political identity with Sunnism and the crystallization of an early modern bureaucratic state, in which the bureaucratic elite looked upon Ottoman Turkish as a key component of its identity. Of the sciences, Turkish works are represented in the fields of medicine, astrology, and alchemy, but in terms of philosophy, there is only a single Turkish work on logic. In what follows, I will not detail all the remaining items in 'Atufi's inventory that refer to Turkish books, as these have been discussed by other contributors to this volume under such subjects as medicine, geomancy, astrology, etc. Rather, I shall limit myself to fleshing out some characteristic features of the collection, which can also help us to better contextualize the books of Turkish poetry that it contains.

Certain genres in the inventory are connected to the context of religious education, either at the palace school or at madrasas. The establishment of eight madrasas by Mehmed II, known as the Şahin-i Şemân, at the mosque complex in his new capital Istanbul and the hierarchical educational system that developed for training a religious and bureaucratic cadre was a key step in Ottoman centralization and in nurturing a ruling elite that espoused the imperial ethos. Because the language of instruction at the madrasas was Arabic, translations or commentaries in Turkish were probably used mostly in the novice stages. It is, therefore, not a surprise that we encounter a Turkish Qur'an translation in the inventory, although the number of full Turkish translations of the Qur'an did not rise significantly until modern times. The first full rendition of the Qur'an in Anatolia was completed by Muhammed b. Hamza in 827/1424, and we do not know if the untitled Qur'an translation listed by 'Atufi is identical with this interlinear piece.¹⁰⁷ But the inventory does contain the anonymous Cevāhirü'l-aşdāf (The Essences of Pearls), a popular explanatory Qur'an commentary commissioned by the Jandarid ruler Isfandiyar b. [Kötürüm] Bayezid (r. 1392–1440).¹⁰⁸ 'Atufi also lists another unidentifiable exegetical work, and two on the art of reciting the Qur'an, one of them versified.¹⁰⁹ Interestingly, none of the three known fifteenth-century Turkish translations of Abu al-Layth al-Samarqandi's Tafsīr al-Qur'ān al-Karīm (Commentary on the Magnificent Qur'an), by Ahmed-i Da'i (d. after 1421), Musa b. Hac Husayn al-İzniki (d. 1430), and Shihab al-Din Ahmad b. Muhammad b. 'Arabshah (d. 1450), respectively, can be found in the inventory, for reasons unknown to me at present. However, one might speculate that they are missing from the inventory for the same reason that we see a scarcity of pre-1450 Turkish poetry: they came from different patronage networks.¹¹⁰ There are only three prayer books and sermons, genres that would proliferate from the late sixteenth century onward, and all of them are in verse: the Turkish verse translation of al-Du'ā'-i sayfi (The Prayer of a Sword) attributed to 'Ali, also known as Ḥīrz-i yamānī (Amulet against Evil), and two verse translations from the Arabic of the al-Lāmīya fi al-Tawḥīd (Poem on Unity Rhyming in the Letter Lām), a versified confession of faith written by al-Ushi (d. 1179), who was an important Hanafi scholar of jurisprudence; one of these translations is the work of an unidentifiable Şem'î.¹¹¹ Indeed, it is Hanafi jurisprudence that is best represented among Turkish works on the subject, which is in line with the Ottomans' favoring of Hanafism since the end of the fifteenth century. Turkish works on Hanafi jurisprudence include Qutbūd-dinzade İzniki's Mukaddime (Introduction), a jurisprudential manual for beginners written in simple language; the translations of Qadikhan's (d. 1196) collection of legal opinions; and a volume that is likely the Turkish rendition of Ibn al-Sa'ati's (d. 1294) foundational compendium of Hanafi law. In addition, we also find in the inventory the unidentified Kitāb al-farā'id (Book on the Distribution of Inheritance Shares), probably also representing the Hanafi school.¹¹²

Only one book in Turkish was dedicated to grammar in Bayezid II's library, despite the fact that grammar constituted a core subject in the madrasa curriculum. This work, which was likely written to help those learning Arabic, is the otherwise unknown Muhammad b. al-Khatib al-Ladhiqi's Kitāb-i tarjuma-yi Sharḥ [al-] 'Izzī (Translation of the Commentary on al-'Izzī), a work not extant today. It is the Turkish translation of a commentary on 'Izz al-Din al-Zanjani's (fl. mid-thirteenth century) highly popular book on Arabic morphology titled Mabādi' al-taṣrīf (Beginnings of Morphology), or al-Taṣrīf al-'izzī (The Magnificent Morphology), written in 625/1228. Indeed, al-Zanjani's textbook on Arabic morphology received great attention at the Ottoman court library, as is evidenced by several copies of the work, as well as the commentaries written on it in Arabic and Persian, including al-Taftazani's abridged version listed by 'Atufi. We know of at least one commentator on al-Zanjani's work who was active at the Ottoman court, Hocazade Muslihuddin Efendi (d. 1488), whose treatise in Arabic may well be identical with one of the commentaries listed in the inventory. Although we know nothing about the Turkish translation of the commentary aside from the name of the translator, in all likelihood the great interest in Arabic grammar in general and Zanjani's morphology in particular at this time can account for the many copies of this work, the commentaries on it, and its Turkish translation.¹¹³

TRANSLATIONS AND COURT PATRONAGE

Muhammad b. al-Khatib al-Ladhiqi's translation of a commentary on Zanjani is representative of an important aspect in the development of the Ottoman royal library collection at the time 'Atufi compiled the inventory. The number of Turkish works in the inventory that are translations or, in the case of poetry, paraphrases of works written in Arabic and Persian might tell us something about how active the library of Bayezid II and the Ottoman court were in commissioning such translations, and, more broadly, in facilitating literary and scholarly activities. However, undertaking such an investigation presents certain obstacles. Even if there are correspondences between Persian and Arabic works, on the one hand, and their Turkish translations or paraphrases, on the other, a translation of any given work could be based on a Persian or Arabic copy (or copies) of the work that was not held at the palace library, just as its creation might have had nothing to do with Bayezid II's court. Nevertheless, even when one cannot prove their direct connection with Mehmed II or Bayezid II's court patronage, such correspondences bespeak the sensibilities and tastes of the Ottoman palace elite for the Perso-Arabic literary canon of the time, as well as its Turkish rendition. The matter needs further research than the few preliminary examples pointed out here. A sufficiently large number of such correspondences would be additional proof that the Ottoman court was highly, and likely intentionally, active in the transfer of knowledge between the Perso-Arabic and the Turkish literary traditions.

Didacticism at an elementary madrasa level must have also inspired the court to acquire copies or even commission the translation of instructional books in Hanafi law. For example, 'Atufi lists the following works, which have already been mentioned, in both the Arabic original and their Turkish translations: al-Ushi's al-Qaṣīda al-lāmiyya fī al-tawḥīd (Poem on Unity Rhyming in the Letter Lām),¹¹⁴ Qadikhan's collection of legal opinions, and Ibn al-Sa'ati's Majma' al-baḥrayn (Confluence of the Two Seas).¹¹⁵

Another example is a treatise on music by Mehmed Çelebi of Ladik (d. beg. of the sixteenth century), titled Zayn al-alḥān fī 'ilm al-ta'līf wa-al-awzān (Decking of Melodies in the Science of Composition and Measures) and written in 888/1483-84 in Arabic. For some unknown reason, this work is not included in 'Atufi's inventory, but a copy of it that bears the seal of Bayezid II is housed in the Ayasofya collection at the Süleymaniye Library. A year after its composition, Mehmed Çelebi of Ladik translated his own work into Turkish, dedicating his translation, too, to Bayezid II; 'Atufi includes this translation in his inventory.¹¹⁶ Another Persian historical work is Fazl Allah Qazvini's (d. 1329) Mu'jam fi āthār mulūk al-'ajam (Alphabetical [Account] of the Deeds of the Kings of Persia), seven copies of which are listed in the inventory. The work was translated into Turkish by Sarıca Kemal (d. after 1489) as Tercüme-yi Kitābü'l-mu'cem (Translation of the Alphabetical Book), better known as Tercümān-i belāğat (Translation of the Book of Eloquence) or Belāğatnāme.¹¹⁷

In poetry, illustrative examples include narrative romances that are Turkish translations or paraphrases of Persian samples of the genre. For example, we find in the inventory both the abovementioned Cemali's Turkish Hümā ve Hümāyūn and its model, Khwaju Kirmani's Persian version of the story, the latter in at least two copies.¹¹⁸ Haydar Khwarizmi's aforementioned Gul u Nawrūz, which is a paraphrase of Jalal Tabib's Persian version written in 734/1333-34, is likewise not the result of Ottoman court patronage, but rather signifies Bayezid II and his librarian's interest in collecting different versions of a particular tale in his library, which is evident in the inventory. 'Atufi lists several copies of a Persian Gul u Nawrūz, some of which preserve the better-known version written by Khwaju Kirmani (d. 1349?), but the copies listed without an author in the inventory might refer to Jalal Tabib's version, especially because a manuscript of the latter exists in the Süleymaniye Library (Ayasofya 3857).¹¹⁹

The issue of the missing works and poets that would become prominent right after the compilation of the inventory, along with the dramatic leap in the production of Turkish poetry and historiography, suggests that the very compilation of the inventory, and more generally, the inventorying of resources at the palace library, must have been a motivating factor for the production of more Turkish works. It may well be that after 'Atufi took stock of what existed in the library, he and his patron realized the need for more literature in Turkish and set out to outline new directions for developing the collection. The contrast between the great number of poets represented in the Īnāmāt Defteri and the relatively meager number of Turkish divans in the inventory, as well as the leap in the production of Turkish historiography, epistolary, and poetry in the rest of the sixteenth century, might hint at a conscious strategy on the part of Ottoman elites regarding language policies in general and library development in particular.

CONCLUDING REMARKS ON TURKISH AND TURKIC IN BAYEZID II'S LIBRARY

To sum up, the palace library inventory represents a stage when there was not yet a solid Turkish literary canon. The small quantity of works in Turkish and the lack of divans by most of the contemporary Turkish poets show that this language was still regarded as the idiom of popular culture at the time. To be sure, virtually all genres are represented in Turkish in the inventory, and the presence of Chaghatay Turkic works, mostly coming as gifts from Timurid lands, certainly provided a model for literary creativity and patronage. However, there were no institutions that perpetuated a Turkish literary canon or conveyed it to Istanbul; therefore, the Ottoman elite had to rely on its own networks when commissioning literary works in the Turkish vernacular.

We have seen that the majority of volumes in Turkish in the inventory derive from the patronage networks surrounding the courts of Mehmed II and Bayezid II. The long tradition of narrative court poetry and popular mystical poetry of the preceding period is mostly unattested. Equally unattested is most of the translation activity that had not been undertaken on behalf of the Ottoman court in the late fifteenth century. In keeping with Tahera Qutbuddin's argument that the palace library served didactic purposes, as well as Abdurrahman Atçıl's conclusion that it was a lending library, we might add that Turkish played an increasingly important role in the training of the palace elite. The literary production in Turkish was generated by the requirements of the palace cadre, most of whom had slave origins. As Arabic continued to be the language used at the madrasa, it was mainly introductory, elementary works of theology that were translated into Turkish, probably to facilitate the study of novices at the beginning stages of their madrasa education.

According to Gönül Tekin, the Ottoman court played a central role in the spread and development of Turkish literature. She suggests that Ottoman literature developed in a pyramidal fashion: first at the palace and then among the Ottoman state elite, and only later spreading to the lower echelons of society.¹²⁰ This may be true in certain genres starting in the late sixteenth century, but such a phenomenon is hard to detect at the beginning of the sixteenth century when 'Atufi compiled the inventory. As we have seen, it is striking how selective the book collection of Bayezid II was: much of the Turkophone literature of the previous two centuries was left out and many contemporary poets do not feature in the inventory, either. It is probably more correct to say that after the conquest of Istanbul and especially from the early sixteenth century on, the Ottoman court gradually emerged as the chief sponsor of Turkophone literature, and would increasingly define the literary taste and style. However, as has been convincingly suggested by Sooyong Kim and Suraiya Faroqhi, the role of the court should never be exaggerated, since poetry was practiced in various social venues that included, amongst others, the dervish cloister and the marketplace, as well as provincial towns. Indeed, most Ottoman poets were not court poets; their relationship with their patrons was usually on and off; and the sultan was not necessarily the chief taste-maker. Both in poetry and in other arts, there were varied proclivities, even at the court.¹²¹

Building the book collection, at least the Turkish part of it, was a highly personal and political affair. As remarked by Cornell Fleischer, there may well have been books that were accessible to only a narrow circle of courtiers around the sultan.¹²² In this regard, one might ask why the divan of Mehmed II himself is missing from the inventory, although it is also possible that it was compiled at a later date.¹²³ Just as there were no institutionalized procedures or set bureaucratic channels for book acquisition, there was also no Ottoman Turkish literary canon to speak of, which might help to account for some of the gaps in the collection.¹²⁴

The inventory reflects how the Ottoman court tried to shape the Turkish literary tradition. Instead of continuing the heritage of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, the new, madrasa-trained palace elite was mostly interested in the literati from the networks around the palace. We also find in the inventory works from Sufi groups affiliated with the court. Many literati sought inspiration from the highly Persianized and Arabicized Turkic of their Timurid contemporaries. As such, the inventory belongs to a transitional period of Ottoman Turkish as a language and literary tradition. It does not reflect the great transformations of the sixteenth century, when the language became thoroughly imbued with Persian and Arabic vocabulary, as well as syntactic and stylistic elements. By the end of the sixteenth century, Ottoman Turkish supplanted Persian for purposes of poetry at the court. The Turkish works in the palace library collection were part of the universalist cultural-political aspirations of Mehmed II and Bayezid II, which found expression in multiple languages and triggered a growing need for Turkish literature. The latter thus came to be conceived not as the continuation of a parochial, tribal tradition, but as heir to the prestigious heritage of Arabic and Persian. With respect to Turkish items in the inventory, then, the contrast between the lacunae and the sudden increase of Turkish literary production immediately after 'Atufi compiled his inventory makes it possible to speculate that the lacunae in this catalogue triggered a demand for more works in Turkish. Or, more broadly, we can at least say that the inventorying of knowledge and the literary past that the inventory represents was part of the Ottoman effort to lay claim to that heritage, while increasingly conceiving of Turkish as an integral part of it.

PART II: PERSIAN LEXICOGRAPHY IN THE LIBRARY OF BAYEZID II

The remainder of this essay discusses the presence of Persian lexicography in the inventory compiled by 'Atufi. It attempts to contextualize such items and addresses the question of what role Persian lexical works might have played in the Ottoman intellectual enterprise. Although the focus here is on Persian, we continue to consider the issue of its relationship with Ottoman Turkish and the broader role of lexicography. Falling between the fields of Iranian and Ottoman studies, which are still largely compartmentalized along ethno-linguistic and nationalist lines, the use and role of Persian in Ottoman intellectual and literary history is a greatly unexplored field in scholarship. Some of the contributions to the present volume are starting to remedy this lacuna.¹²⁵

'Atufi's inventory contains almost fifty volumes, comprising over seventy titles, related to Persian lexicography and grammar. There are a number of Persian monolingual dictionaries, but most of the titles are Arabic-Persian bilingual glossaries. There are also a handful of glossaries or word lists that use multiple languages, including Persian. As has already been argued above, the sponsorship of Persian was an important part of the Ottomans' intellectual heritage and of Mehmed II's cultural policies that combined Islamic, Turko-Mongol, and Mediterranean notions of authority.¹²⁶ Persian gave the Ottomans access to a cosmopolitan high culture patronized at courts and in urban contexts throughout the entire post-Mongol Persianate world. In what follows, I will also discuss works that may not have been strictly dictionaries or glossaries but were rather rudimentary expositions of Persian grammar, since in certain cases, the difference between a glossary and a grammatical treatise of verbal paradigms, for example, proves difficult to draw.

As is indicated by 'Atufi's inventory, the Ottoman elite were highly receptive connoisseurs of Persian lexicography from various traditions. Unfortunately, however, few correspondences between 'Atufi's entries and extant manuscript copies of these works can be established. Therefore, the inventory does not give us a full picture of whence the Ottoman elite inherited this tradition; i.e., we do not know where most manuscripts preserving Persian lexicographic material originated. However, it is still possible to tentatively connect the book collection of Bayezid II with later copies from the sixteenth century, and claim that Persian continued to be part of the Ottoman enterprise, giving rise to a Perso-Turkish lexicographical tradition on Ottoman soil that came down to modern times. On a different note, Persian lexicography was the product of a vast geo-cultural space covering Iran, the Ottoman territories, and India. Naturally, 'Atufi's collection does not reflect the contributions of India, where Persian lexicography picked up in speed and volume under the Mughals between the sixteenth and eighteenth centuries. Nevertheless, it is safe to hypothesize that lexicography was part of the Persian literary heritage, which had been shared and sponsored by both the Ottomans and other beyliks in Anatolia during the fourteenth to fifteenth centuries. That tradition received a huge boost with the Timurid and Turkmen dynasties' patronage of Persian letters, which constituted an important source of inspiration for the Ottoman literary scene from the mid-fifteenth century onwards.

The number of Persian lexicographical works in 'Atufi's inventory is dwarfed by that of Arabic dictionaries.¹²⁷ The latter had a much older and more extensive tradition, while the institutional, cultural, and ritual sphere available for Persian in the Ottoman context was considerably limited. As has already been pointed out above, Arabic had long been the language of theology, jurisprudence, and philosophy, and was thus the language used at the madrasa. By contrast, Persian was chiefly taught in private settings, probably with an emphasis on rote memorization, especially large chunks of poetry. The glossaries and short grammatical descriptions discussed below reveal that students were also required to learn Persian grammatical paradigms such as conjugations. The demand for Persian was partly due to the court's need for a cadre versed in Persian to work in the chancellery, and Persian was required in order to maintain a prestigious court culture. In addition, Persian was also in demand among various Sufi communities, most prominently the Mevlevis, as well as other literati who wanted to be conversant in this cosmopolitan language of culture. Signifying the high prestige in which Persian literature was held at the Ottoman court, dictionaries were used for instructional purposes and as reference manuals. As such, dictionaries also facilitated translation and imitation, thereby aiding the transfer of Arabic and Persian vocabulary into the nascent Ottoman Turkish literary tradition and language, which would be espoused by the Ottoman elite as a key part of their identity in the sixteenth century.

It is common knowledge that from the late fifteenth century onwards, Ottoman Turkish was thoroughly saturated with features of Persian and Arabic, including vocabulary, style, rhetoric, topoi, imagery, and even syntax. The agents of this transfer were mainly the new bureaucratic elite—literati trained at the imperial madrasas built by Mehmed II. This is not to suggest that Persian and Arabic elements had not entered vernacular Turkish before that time. However, the first transmission of such elements probably occurred orally through the evangelizing activities of dervish communities and as part of the Islamic high culture cultivated at various Anatolian courts, from where it trickled down to the level of popular lore. This process was not necessarily dependent on literati who were proficiently bilingual or trilingual in Arabic, Persian, and Turkish. Hence Turkish vocabulary continued to dominate the Turkish vernacular of Anatolia prior to the sixteenth century. This stage of linguistic influence is termed by John Perry vernacular borrowing. The Persian lexicographic works listed in ‘Atufi’s inventory, however, bear witness to the second stage, which Perry terms scriptural borrowing, which occurred in the late fifteenth century and was brought about by the palace elite and the nascent bureaucracy—i.e., highly literate multilinguals. As Perry argues concerning the role of Persian-Arabic bilingualism in the evolution of New Persian, at the linguistic level this learned or literary stage meant not only “the incorporation of single loanwords but [also] the evolution of systematic lexical strategies and semantic and syntactic calques on Arabic—the true sign of bilingual interference.”¹²⁸ While lexemes transferred through vernacular borrowing are phonologically and morphologically integrated into the receiving language, scriptural or literary borrowing is characterized by a certain conservatism, because self-conscious multilingual elites engaged in transferring elements from the prestige languages try to preserve the features of those languages. Interestingly, this process had already taken place in New Persian, prior to Ottoman borrowings from both Arabic and Persian. In the Ottoman case, it is difficult to tell how much of a role the Ottoman literati played in this conservatism and to what extent they relied on the linguistic strategies of Iranian literati from previous centuries.¹²⁹

Persian Monolingual Dictionaries

‘Atufi lists a number of important Persian monolingual dictionaries. Some of these lexicographic works were originally produced as reference manuals written by eastern Iranian literati for poets in western Iran in the eleventh century. The dictionaries enabled the latter group to read and imitate the East Iranian, Khurasanian poetic tradition, which was sponsored initially at the Samanid court in the tenth century and would become the basis of the New Persian literary language. We know of but a few of these monolingual dictionaries, and only one of them is extant today, the Lughat-i furs (Dictionary of Persia), compiled by ‘Ali b. Ahmad Asadi Tusi (d. after 1066), two copies of which ‘Atufi registers in the library inventory. It is a rhyme dictionary, arranged in a way similar to a poetic divan and containing quotations from Persian poetry as illustrations.¹³⁰ The popularity of the work is demonstrated by the fact that the extant manuscript copies were subject to numerous alterations and interpolations, attesting to their active use. The inventory registers a commentary on this work, an imitation, as well as an abridged version thereof.¹³¹

Another of the monolingual Persian dictionaries is Shams al-Din Muhammad b. Hindushah Nakhjivani’s Siḥāḥ al-furs (Sound Ones of Persia, or Siḥāḥ al-‘ajam in some manuscripts). Composed in Tabriz in 1328, it was dedicated to Ghiyath al-Din (d. 1336), vizier to the Ilkhanids and a noted patron of the arts and learning in the wake of his father, the famous historian Rashid al-Din (d. 1318). Also a rhyming dictionary, this work follows Asadi Tusi, but its arrangement is modeled on Jawhari’s Siḥāḥ, a prominent Arabic monolingual dictionary of Samanid and Ghaznavid times. Accordingly, it is divided into chapters defined by the last letter of the words therein, but the chapters themselves are subdivided according to the first letter of the lemmata.¹³² The composition of Nakhjivani’s Siḥāḥ may well exemplify the consolidation of Persian as the language of administration and literature in the Persianate world in general and in Mongol-period Iran in particular, when Arabic was finally relegated to the realms of theology, jurisprudence, and philosophy.

Staples of any book collection that emphasized Persian literary products, the rhyme dictionaries by both

Asadi Tusi and Muhammad b. Hindushah were lexicons that helped Ottoman literati who wished to wield their reeds in Persian. Moreover, such works also facilitated the composition of poems in Ottoman Turkish, a literary idiom that was increasingly suffused with Arabic and Persian vocabulary elements.¹³³

Arabic-Persian Dictionaries

‘Atufi’s inventory contains several Arabic-Persian dictionaries, written at the same time as the Persian monolingual dictionaries mentioned above. The tradition of compiling Arabic-Persian dictionaries, too, was part of the process in eastern Iran under such dynasties as the Samanids and Ghaznavids, whereby Persian emerged as an Islamic literary language and spread to western Iran. Such dictionaries facilitated the addition of Arabic vocabulary elements to Persian, or rather, they aided the interpretation of new vocabulary that was being incorporated into the language. These works also represented a scholarly need to monitor and control the process of vocabulary borrowing.¹³⁴ Along with other Persian lexicographic works, Arabic-Persian dictionaries probably fulfilled similar functions in the Ottoman context for the increasingly vigorous and prominent Ottoman Turkish literary tradition.¹³⁵

Topical Arabic-Persian Dictionaries

Arabic-Persian dictionaries arranged according to topic are limited to a definite corpus or subject. Most characteristic are Qur’an glossaries, whose number is quite small in ‘Atufi’s inventory. They include only the Tarājim al-a‘jīm fī al-lughā al-qur’āniyya (Translation of Persian Loans in the Language of the Qur’an) by Abu al-Ma‘ali Ahmad b. Muhammad al-Ghaznavi (fourteenth century), and two others that cannot be identified.¹³⁶ At this point, it can only speculatively be proposed that the reason for this small number of such works is that the study of the Qur’an was the domain of the madrasa, where Arabic ruled supreme.

Maṣādir and Asāmī Glossaries

Due to the non-segmental character of Arabic morphology, early Arabic lexicography listed action nouns and nouns as appendices, which gave rise to two separate lexical genres: vocabularies of maṣādir (action nouns) and of asāmī (nouns). Such glossaries facilitated, documented, and perhaps codified the transfer of these elements from Arabic into Persian, and thence into Turkish. Maṣādir vocabularies are particularly important, as both Persian and Turkish action nouns of Arabic origin are extensively used in analytical verb formation: an Arabic maṣdar is complemented by an auxiliary verb, such as kardan (to do) or shudan (to be, to become) in Persian, and etmek or olmak in Turkish, thereby producing complex verbs such as tashakkur kardan and teşekkür etmek (to thank).

‘Atufi lists the best-known and most popular representatives of the maṣādir genre, arranged in order of morphological complexity and the characteristic vowels of conjugated forms. One of these is Abu ‘Abd Allah al-Husayn b. Ahmad al-Zawzani’s (d. 1093) Maṣādir (Action Nouns), a copy of which is at the Topkapı Palace Library with the seal of Bayezid II.¹³⁷ The other is the Tāj al-maṣādir (The Crown of Action Nouns/Sources) by Ahmad b. ‘Ali al-Bayhaqi (1077–1150), known as Bu Ja‘farak, of which three copies are listed in the inventory.¹³⁸ In addition, the learned librarian registers a list of Arabic verbs, accompanied by their Persian translations, which cannot be identified at this point.¹³⁹

Asāmī type dictionaries contain nouns as well as adjectives and sometimes particles. The inventory lists the al-Sāmī fī al-asāmī (The Exalted Names, dated 1104), compiled by Ahmad b. Muhammad al-Maydani al-Nishapuri (d. 1124), who divided it into four topical parts (qism): on religion, animals, and the terrestrial and celestial spheres.¹⁴⁰ The popularity of the work can be seen from the fact that ‘Atufi’s inventory even lists a commentary on it, which cannot be identified.¹⁴¹ ‘Atufi also has an entry on two alphabetically arranged noun dictionaries, one titled Kitāb al-asmā’ ‘alā tartīb al-ḥurūf (Book of Nouns in Alphabetical Order), identifiable as part of an anthology of lexica copied by one Siraj b. Tayyib al-Sunisa’i on 3 Rabi‘ I 870/2 November 1465, which will be discussed below.¹⁴² In addition, the inventory cites another alphabetically organized glossary of nouns, which might be either in Arabic or in both Arabic and Persian.¹⁴³

Universal Arabic-Persian Dictionaries

There are a number of comprehensive dictionaries in 'Atufi's inventory. For example, he lists several manuscripts of Zamakhshari's (d. 1144) Muqaddimat al-adab (Introduction to Literature), already touched upon when we discussed Turkish/Turkic lexicography. The author—a Mu'tazilite theologian, Hanafi jurist, and philologist—dedicated his work to one of the rulers of the Khwarizmshahid dynasty, Abu al-Muzaffar 'Ala al-Din Qizil Arslan Atsiz b. Muhammad (r. 1127–56), who was the Seljukid governor of Khwarazm at the time. Remarkably, the various copies of this Arabic-Persian dictionary are different in terms of the language of interlinear translations that accompanies them, demonstrating the popularity of the work and the many different contexts in which it was used. For instance, aside from four copies with Persian interlinear translation, 'Atufi registers a copy with Persian and Latin (afranjiyya), and two with Persian and Turkish.¹⁴⁴ At this point it is difficult to explain why the extant manuscripts, one of which bears the seal of Bayezid II, have Eastern (Chaghatay) Turkic glosses, which 'Atufi would normally designate as "Mongolian" (al-mughūliyya), whereas these particular interlinear glosses he only designates as Turkish.¹⁴⁵ As the case may be, such entries of Zamakhshari's Muqaddimat al-adab either refer to copies with Ottoman Turkish interlinear glosses or to ones with Eastern Turkic glosses. But because these items are in a section with entries in Persian and Arabic, here the learned librarian does not deem it necessary to indicate the linguistic difference between Eastern Turkic ("Mongolian") and Ottoman Turkish, in contrast to the entries in the section of Turkish and Turkic books of poetry. Be that as it may, the Eastern Turkic glosses of the extant copies in Ottoman libraries tentatively indicate that at least some manuscripts of Zamakhshari's dictionary listed by 'Atufi might have originated in the territories of the Golden Horde, Transoxiana, Khorasan, or Mamluk Egypt or Syria.

The inventory also registers the Qānūn-i adab (The Code of Literature, dated 1150–51) by Hubaysh Tiflisi (d. 1231–32?), a noted physician, astrologist, and litterateur under the Seljuks.¹⁴⁶ This is the earliest strictly alphabetical bilingual dictionary, which mainly served as a rhyme dictionary and thesaurus for a readership in western Iran and Seljuk Anatolia. Its appendices also provide information on maṣḍars, plurals, and biographies of Arab poets and notables. Although we cannot be entirely certain, it appears that 'Atufi lists the al-Ṣurāḥ min al-Ṣiḥāḥ (Explication of [Jawhari's] Ṣiḥāḥ, dated 1282) by Abu al-Fazl Jamal al-Din Qarshi of Kashghar (d. after 1303). Another rhyme dictionary, this work is an abridged translation of Jawhari's monolingual Arabic dictionary titled al-Ṣiḥāḥ fī al-lughā (Sound Forms in Arabic), dispensing with the verse citations of the model and glossing each of the 40,000 entries with a single word in Persian.¹⁴⁷ In addition, 'Atufi registers a volume with two lists of Arabic verbs accompanied by Persian interlinear translations, which cannot be identified at this point.¹⁴⁸

Versified Arabic-Persian Glossaries

The inventory contains a few versified vocabularies, composed in such manner to facilitate rote learning. One is the immensely popular Niṣāb al-ṣibyān (Basics for Youth) by Abu Nasr Farahi (d. 1242), two copies of which are listed by 'Atufi. One of these can be identified as featuring in the abovementioned anthology of lexica; the other is included in a similar anthology that cannot be identified in existing manuscript collections. The work enjoyed great popularity and was part of primary education; aside from an abundance of copies, it gave rise to countless imitations and commentaries.¹⁴⁹ 'Atufi registers one such imitation: the Naṣīb al-fityān (The Allotment of Youth) by Husam al-Din Hasan b. 'Abd al-Mu'min al-Khoyi (d.?), which can also be found in the aforesaid anthology housed at the Topkapı Palace Library, and which bears the seal of Bayezid II.¹⁵⁰ Finally, we should mention two copies of the work that 'Atufi registers as Uqūd al-zawāhir (Flower Garlands), which is perhaps identical with Ahmed-i Da'i's (d. after 1421) Uqūd al-javāhir (Chains of Pearls), a 650-couplet verse glossary and translation of Rashid al-Din Vatvat's (d. 1133–34) Nuqūd al-zavāhir (Coins of Flowers). This identification, however, is yet to be confirmed by further evidence. Ahmed-i Da'i allegedly wrote the work for Murad II, while the latter was still a prince. Its presence in the inventory, along with that of other works by this prominent litterateur, demonstrates Ahmed-i Da'i's high prestige at successive Ottoman courts and confirms the continuity of a Persian lexicographic tradition prior to the rule of Mehmed II.¹⁵¹

Glossaries Using More than Two Languages

It is remarkable how many dictionaries using more than two languages 'Atufi lists. Some of them might have originally been conceived as bilingual dictionaries, to which later copyists added interlinear translations, but others were actually addressed to an audience with a varied linguistic background in the multilingual context of the Ottoman court. Several of these glossaries employ Persian, too, either as a medium or as the primary language of the dictionary or wordlist.

Some of these dictionaries were written primarily for Turkish speakers, a tradition that grew exponentially in the sixteenth century.¹⁵² Although it has already been discussed above with regard to Turkish lexicography, we should mention again Lutfullah Halimi's (d. end of fifteenth century) Muṣarriḥat al-asmā' (Explanation of Nouns, dated 872/1467-68). This is a dictionary of names selected from al-Jawhari's Ṣiḥāḥ, Ibn Durayd's Jamhara fī al-luḡa, and Ibn Faris's Mujmal al-luḡa, etc., accompanied by interlinear translations in Turkish and Persian.¹⁵³ As has already been mentioned, Halimi is better known for his Persian-Turkish rhyming glossary titled Baḥr al-gharā'ib (Sea of Wonders) and composed in 850/1446, which cannot be found in the inventory. Likely trained in Iran, Halimi seems to have already been at the court of Bayezid in Amasya, where the prince showered lavish patronage on the arts and learning, Persian letters being particularly welcome.

In the latter half of the fifteenth century, Persian was part of a multilingual universe along with the languages of non-Muslim communities in the Ottoman empire, where Arabic, Persian, and Turkish were used by Muslim communities for literary purposes. Most conspicuous in this regard are quadro- and pentalingual glossaries in Arabic, Persian, Turkish, Greek, and Serbian in the inventory. There is a list of names of medicaments in Arabic with translations into Persian, Turkish, and Greek, and a general wordlist of undefined subject matter in Arabic, Persian, Greek, and Serbian.¹⁵⁴ Two such copies carrying the seal of Bayezid II with glossaries and guides in multiple languages are preserved today (Ayasofya 4749 and 4750).¹⁵⁵ Scholars suggest that these were used as teaching aids for either Mehmed II or palace scribes, and that the order of the languages in these compositions correspond to their relative prestige at the time, with Arabic in the lead, followed by Persian; arguably the real target was the instruction of these two languages.¹⁵⁶ If such multilingual volumes were indeed intended for the instruction of recent converts, the linguistic hierarchy enshrined in these books could also serve to remind students of the cultural values accompanying their new religion. One of these volumes contains the Tuḥfetü'l-hādiye (The Gift of the Rod) by Muhammed b. Hac İlyas, a Persian-Turkish dictionary also known as Kitāb-i Dānistān (Book of Knowledge). Interestingly, the copy that 'Atufi registers has interlinear translations in Greek, Latin, and other languages as well.¹⁵⁷ The volume contains further glossaries and grammatical manuals, such as the standard guidebook on regular Arabic inflection and conjugation titled Risālat al-amthila al-muṭṭarida (Treatise on Regular Examples [of Conjugation]), accompanied by interlinear translations in Persian and other languages, as well as a treatise on Greek astronomical terms.¹⁵⁸ 'Atufi lists another anthology with almost identical content: a list of Arabic words with interlinear Persian, Greek, and Serbian translation; Porphyry's introduction to his logic; and the aforesaid guide to Arabic conjugation.¹⁵⁹

There are also a few works registered by 'Atufi that are not multilingual but are certainly indicative of the linguistically inquisitive ethos at the court. Accordingly, we find in the inventory a treatise on an unidentifiable northwestern Iranian dialect, Fahlawīyya, which might also refer to Middle Persian or Pahlavi.¹⁶⁰ Also worthy of mention is another unidentifiable work, which might be a Persian treatise on the Hebrew language.¹⁶¹

Books on Grammar

The prominence of Persian at the Ottoman court is also demonstrated by the inclusion of Persian translations of books on Arabic grammar in 'Atufi's inventory. We have no information as to the readership these works attracted. Were they produced and used by Iranian emigrants? This is possible, but not in the least certain; the glossaries of Halimi, Ahmedi, and perhaps Ahmed-i Da'i (mentioned below) show that there were Persian glossaries produced in Anatolia in the fifteenth century. The inventory lists the Persian translations of Ibn Babashadh's (d. 1077) grammatical treatise, Kitāb al-hādī fī sharḥ al-muqaddima fī al-naḥw (Book of Guidance Commenting on the Introduction to Grammar); Ibn Qayyim Jawziyya's (d. 1350) Ma'ānī al-adawāt wa-al-ḥurūf (Meanings of Particles and Letters); Mutarrizi's (d. 1213) al-Miṣbāḥ fī 'ilm al-naḥw (Lantern in the Science of Grammar); 'Izz al-Din Zanjani's (d. 1262?) Kitāb al-taṣrīf (Book on Morphology), and two unidentifiable treatises on grammar and morphology, respectively.¹⁶²

Two Lexicographical Anthologies

'Atufi lists two lexicographical anthologies that use Persian to such an extent that they warrant a separate treatment. One of them is almost certainly identical with the anthology housed at the Topkapı Palace Library titled Jāmi' al-lughāt (Compendium of Dictionaries). It was compiled and copied, and partially composed, in 869–70/1465–66 (Karatay erroneously reads 867/1466) by a certain Siraj b. Tayyib b. al-Haj Ahmad al-Sunisa'i, secretary at the law court of Edirne, who came from the village of İrek (?) in the Amasya province.¹⁶³ The collection was undoubtedly put together with instructional purposes in mind. In addition to the two standard Arabic-Persian versified dictionaries discussed above—the Niṣāb al-ṣibyān (Basics for Youth) by Abu Nasr Farahi and the Naṣīb al-fityān (The Allotment of Youth) by Husam al-Din al-Khoyi¹⁶⁴—Siraj al-Sunisa'i includes in his anthology three other Arabic-Persian versified dictionaries: Ahmedī's Mirqāt al-adab (The Staircase to Literature);¹⁶⁵ Muhammad b. al-Bavvab's Tuḥfa-yi 'alā'ī (Lofty Gift);¹⁶⁶ and the Uqūd al-jawāhir (Garlands of Jewels), which was likely written by Ahmed-i Da'i (d. after 1421) and dedicated to Murad II.¹⁶⁷ Also intended for the instruction of Arabic is a list of nouns used in Zamakhshari's seminal Qur'an commentary titled al-Kashshāf 'an ḥaqā'iq al-tanzīl (The Unveiler of the Truths of the Revelation), an important textbook in Ottoman madrasa education. This particular copy of the work is accompanied by an interlinear translation of the nouns into Persian.¹⁶⁸ In addition, Siraj al-Sunisa'i includes a treatise on Persian grammar composed by one Lujja-yi (?) Pir Hamid al-Sivasi, which comprises a list of Persian verbs with interlinear Turkish translations followed by a grammar of Persian verbs and a list of nouns in alphabetical order;¹⁶⁹ a treatise on Arabic morphology with Turkish explanations composed by Siraj al-Sunisa'i himself;¹⁷⁰ and a glossary of Turkish accompanied by explanations in Persian, also composed by Siraj al-Sunisa'i.¹⁷¹

Also consisting of works written for instructional purposes, the other lexicographical anthology is considerably similar in terms of content, but I have not yet been able to connect it to any extant manuscript. It contains works written for the instruction of Arabic, such as an alphabetically arranged list of Arabic nouns; versified glossaries like Abu Nasr Farahi's Niṣāb al-ṣibyān (Basics for Youth) and its imitation, the Naṣīb al-fityān (The Allotment of Youth), Ahmedī's Mirqāt al-adab (The Staircase to Literature), and Ibn Bavvab's Tuḥfa-yi 'alā'ī (Lofty Gift); and an alphabetically arranged glossary of Persian. Remarkably, this anthology also contains two treatises—most likely wordlists—on Turkish, one of them accompanied by Arabic translations, and the other with Persian glosses. Finally, in this volume is what appears to be a list of Arabic conjugations and inflections.¹⁷²

LEXICOGRAPHY AND THE POLITICS OF PERSIAN UNDER BAYEZID II

As demonstrated by the more than 500 volumes and 700 titles in Persian that are listed in 'Atufi's inventory, there was an active readership for Persian among the Ottoman elite. Dictionaries, glossaries, word lists, and grammatical sketches using Persian either as a medium or as the target language reveal that this elite was heavily invested in learning Persian in order to gain access to the prestigious literary tradition of the language, which in turn made it possible for literati to take up positions in the administration or to win high esteem by producing translations and writing poetry in Persian, even just a few ghazals to show off one's erudition.

The fact that there are so many works registered by 'Atufi that use Persian as a medium language for the study of Arabic certainly highlights that many literati reached a considerable level of conversance in Persian. While it is unlikely that Persian was used extensively as the language of oral instruction, glossaries where Arabic is the target language and Persian is the medium suggest that it was often unnecessary to add Turkish interlinear translation, because of many Ottomans' proficiency in Persian. We can also speculate that even glossaries in which Arabic was the target language, but which contained interlinear Persian translations, could have been used for instruction in Persian or as reference works to facilitate the reading of Persian literary texts. In addition, we should not forget that both literacy and multilingualism are gradational: in the case of Persian, just as with Arabic, there were people who could speak, read, and write in the language, but some people could only read, whereas some could even compose poetry with the help of a rhyme dictionary, etc. Those who had a strong basis in Arabic thanks to their madrasa education could certainly start reading Persian texts with the help of an Arabic-Persian glossary and grammatical sketch, especially because most of the Persian texts they would have read contained a considerable amount of Arabic vocabulary. Undoubtedly, it is this interconnected matrix of Arabic, Persian, and Turkish, memorialized in dictionaries like the ones discussed above, that also enabled such an enormous amount of Arabic-Persian vocabulary to be transferred into Turkish.

It is also apparent that aside from inheriting the lexicographical tradition of Persian, the Ottomans also actively contributed to the tradition by producing their own word lists, glossaries, and grammatical sketches. We know very few names of literati (Ahmedi, Ahmed-i Da'i, Siraj al-Sunisai) from fourteenth- to fifteenth-century Anatolia who wrote glossaries using Persian. However, the proliferation of Persian-Turkish glossaries produced in the Ottoman empire from the sixteenth century on certainly accompanied the proliferation of Ottoman Turkish literary practices in that period, and was prefigured by the accumulation of lexicographic material in the library of Mehmed II and Bayezid II.¹⁷³ We might also speculate that the ebbs and flows of the influx of Iranian intellectuals into Ottoman lands must also have contributed to Persian literary activities in general and Persian lexicography in particular.

CONCLUSION

'Atufi's inventory is located at a time when Ottoman Turkish had not yet entirely assumed the functions of the main prestige languages of Persianate Islamic culture, Persian and Arabic, despite the fact that Turkish was already represented in virtually all the literary genres. The court seems to have given further impetus to Turkish as part of the general cultural efflorescence and overarching ethos and policy of patronizing literature, though it mainly sponsored literary production in Persian and Arabic and, equally important, was chiefly interested in reading in these two languages. The inventory reflects the tastes and interests of Mehmed II and Bayezid II, as well as that of the new court elite, the kul, who had been trained at the palace school or the new Ottoman madrasas and who increasingly espoused Turkish as part of their identity throughout the sixteenth century. Due to the lack of a stable Ottoman Turkish literary canon, the inventory only partially represents the Turkish literary production of the fourteenth through the early fifteenth century. Rather than being guided by a canon, members of the extended court acquired and commissioned works in Turkish by relying on their own networks. Such networks were by no means limited to the territories under Ottoman control; the Chaghatay literary tradition, especially in the form produced in Timurid Herat during the time of Nava'i, served as a paradigmatic model of a Turkophone literary tradition with all the characteristics of an elite Islamic literary idiom, to which Ottoman litterateurs would aspire in the sixteenth century.

Persian was the primary model for literary purposes in Ottoman circles when the inventory was compiled. Lexicography using Persian, whether as a target or as a medium language, served as reference works and for didactic purposes. The Ottomans had several copies of the best-known Persian lexica, but they also produced their own glossaries to facilitate the reading of Persian works, a tradition that would continue afterwards. An Ottoman litterateur would be trained in the so-called elsine-i selāse "the triad of languages": Arabic, Persian, and Ottoman Turkish. The latter was conceived of as the corollary of the former two, just as the nascent Ottoman literary tradition would come to be considered the heir of the literary traditions of high Islam. 'Atufi's inventory documents precisely the moment before that shift occurred.

11. TSMA D. 9291/1, D. 9291/2. The collection is analyzed by Judith Pfeiffer in the present volume.
12. Erünsal's most prominent article on the subject has been republished in a revised form; see İsmail E. Erünsal, "Türk Edebiyatı Tarihinin Arşiv Kaynakları 6: 909/1503 Tarihli Defter-i Kütüb," Journal of Turkish Studies, 32, no. 1 (2008): 203–19; and his "908 (1502) Tarihli Saray Kütüphanesi Kataloğu ve Türk Edebiyatı Tarihine Kaynak Olarak Önemi," Edebiyatı Tarihi Yazıları: Arşiv Kaynakları, Yazma Eserler ve Kayıp Metinler (İstanbul: Dergâh, 2016): 257–83.

15. MS Török F. 59, 246 {19}. The problem is further complicated by the fact that Qabuli seems to have compiled two divans. See further below. Erünsal also lists as Turkish Qabuli's otherwise unknown obscene poem titled Bahş-i kün va kus (Contest of the Arse and the Pussy), but, since the item is included in the Persian poetry section, it does not appear to have been written in Turkish (MS Török F. 59, 255 {7}). On Qabuli's Turkish poems, see Günay Kut, "Kabûlî'nin İlk Divanındaki Türkçe Şiirler," in Yazmalara Adanmış Bir Ömür - Nîmet Bayraktar'a Armağan (İstanbul: Türk Kütüphaneciler Derneği İstanbul Şubesi Yayınları, 2006), 102–20; Günay Kut, "Kabûlî'nin İkinci Divanı'ndaki Türkçe Kaside ve Gazeller," Journal of Turkish Studies = Türklük Bilgisi Araştırmaları 31, no. 2 (2006), 107–22.

18. MS Török F. 59, 138 {18}, 264 {18}, 262 {11–13}. Although it is unlikely, the Lutfi mentioned in the Anatolian section might also refer to Molla Lutfi (d. 1495), a prominent Ottoman litterateur and 'Atufi's predecessor as palace librarian. However, there is no indication in the sources that Molla Lutfi had a divan of poetry. See also 'Ömer bin Mezîd, Mecmû'atü'n-nezâ'ir, ed. Mustafa Canpolat (Ankara: Türk Dil Kurumu Yayınları, 1982), 36. A similar case can be found in the section on lexicography, where 'Atufi lists several copies of Zamakhshari's (d. 1144) glossary entitled Muqaddimat al-adab (Introduction to Literature), referring to two of them as the work of Jarullah, failing to realize that Jarullah was in fact Zamakhshari's personal name (ism) and thus these must be different copies or versions of the same work (MS Török F. 59, 294 {11–14, 15–16}, 300 {15–17}).

The sole copy of Safi's divan was originally in Fuat Köprülü's possession, whence it found its way into Erünsal's hands, who informs us that he is planning to publish the work. For a time, the aforesaid Melihî was also affiliated with Revşeni. For Şeyh Vefa's divan, see: MS Török F. 59, 245 {19}–246 {1}, 248 {1–2}. One of these manuscripts has the title Risâle-yi manzûmât-i Şeyh Vefâ (Süleymaniye, Fatih 3899); the other copy (Süleymaniye, Ayasofya 3925), also carrying Bayezid II's seal, contains only Arabic and Persian poems. See Abdülkadir Turgut, "Ebû'l-Vefâ Muslihuddîn Mustafâ'nın Farsça Şiirleri" (master's thesis, İstanbul Üniversitesi Sosyal Bilimler Enstitüsü, 2009), 71–74; Reşat Öngören, "Muslihuddîn Mustafa," TDVİA 31 (2006), 269–71; Reşat Öngören, Tarihte Bir Aydın Tarikatı Zeyniler (İstanbul İnsan, 2003), 130–54; John J. 26. MS Török F. 59, 244 {19}; TSMK, R. 739 (Karataş, T 2282, vol. 2, 98–99); Süleymaniye, Fatih 3794; İ. Halil Ersoylu, Cem Sultan'ın Türkçe Divanı (Ankara: Atatürk, Kültür, Dil ve Tarih Yüksek Kurumu, 1989). The reason 'Atufi registers Cem Sultan's divan among the Persian books of poetry, despite the poet-prince's sizable output in Turkish, might be that Turkish was considered less prestigious. This is indicated by the arrangement of Persian and Turkish poetry

- in copies of Cem Sultan's divan: see TSMK, R. 739, copied during the reign of Selim I (Karatay, T 2282, vol. 2, 98–99); and Süleymaniye, Fatih 3794. In both copies, which are probably related to each other, Prince Cem's Persian poetry is placed in the center of the folios, while his Turkish poems are relegated to the margins.
27. MS Török F. 59, 246 {16}; Sehi Beg, Heşt Bihişt: The Tezkere, ed. Günay Kut, Sources of Oriental Languages and Literatures 5 (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1978), 246. Not all members of the poetic circle around Cem Sultan are listed in the inventory, as several of them probably did not have their own divans. On members of the circle, see Tekin, "Fatih Devri Türk Edebiyatı," 184–86.
 28. Sehi 223–24; Aşık Çelebi 647–50; Latîfî 372–74; MS Török F. 59, 248 {1}; Sedat Kardaş, Tâli'nin Farsça Divanı ve Necâtî Bey Divanı ile Mazmunlar Açısından Mukayesesi (İnceleme-edisyon kritik- transkripsiyonlu metin-tercüme-mukayese) (master's thesis, Erzurum T.C. Atatürk Üniversitesi, 2012).

 30. MS Török F. 59, 246 {11}. Ali Nihad Tarlan, Mehmed Çavuşoğlu, and M. Ali Tanyeri, Zatî Divanı: Edisyon Kritik ve Transkripsiyon (İstanbul: İstanbul Üniversitesi, Edebiyat Fakültesi, 1967). 'Atufi mentions a work titled Kitâb-i Shikâyatnâme (Book of Complaints) in the Persian poetry section and attributes it to Zati (MS Török F. 59, 255 {7}). Erünsal puts the work in his list of Turkish works, but in actuality, we know nothing about it. The fact that 'Atufi lists it as Persian, even though we only know of Zati's Turkish works, should make us cautious in designating it as having been written in Turkish. We might also take heed of Judith Pfeiffer's pertinent remark in her essay in the present volume: "the contributors to this volume have established that the copy of the inventory that is in our hands can be dated to 909. We have therefore assumed that entries of otherwise unusually late authors recorded in Bayezid's inventory, such as Zati (d. 1546, e.g., 246 {11}) and the famous Khayali (d. 1557), refer to different, earlier authors using the same penname, or they were explained in other ways."

44. Libraries in Turkey contain many Nava'i manuscripts dating from the last decade of the fifteenth century, for example Nava'i's khamisa (pentology of narrative poems): TSMK, R. 810, copied by Sultan 'Ali Mashadi in 900/1495–96 (Karatay T 2297, vol. 2, 105); and another khamisa copy (Süleymaniye, Fatih 3755, copied in 895/1490–91). But at this point it would be difficult to determine whether they are identical with the copies in 'Atufi's inventory or whether they made their way to the Ottoman empire after the battle of Chaldiran in 1514, or even later. On Nava'i manuscripts in Istanbul libraries, see Ağâh Sırrı Levend, "Türkiye Kitaplıklarında Nevai Yazmaları," Türk Dili Araştırmaları Yıllığı (Belleten) 6 (1958): 127–209.

 46. As for Nava'i's khamisa (pentology of romances), however, it is unlikely to have been brought by Mü'eyyedzade to Istanbul, since Nava'i completed it only in the latter part of the 1480s. By that time Mü'eyyedzade had already left Timurid Shiraz and returned to Ottoman service.

 51. There is a long-standing debate in scholarship about the authorship of this particular Chaghatay Turkic rendition of the Gul u Nawrûz, with a great many scholars favoring the authorship of Lutfi, and others attributing the work to Haydar Kwarizmi. It has now convincingly been settled that the work belongs to the latter. On the debate, see Ferenc Csirkés, "Lutfi and the Gül u Nawrûz," in Altaica Budapestiensia MMI: Proceedings of the Permanent International Altaistic Conference Budapest, Hungary, June 23–28, 2002, ed.  65. MS Török F. 59, 267 {1–2}. Aḥmed-i Dā'î, Çengnâme (Cambridge, MA: Department of Near Eastern Languages and Civilizations, Harvard University, 1992). The work is a mystical allegory dedicated to Emir Süleyman b. Yıldırım Bayezid I. 'Atufî glosses it as Ushshâq-nâma fî târiḫ Amîr Sulaymân b. Yıldırım Bâyezîd Khân -khullîdat khilâfatuhum (The Book of Lovers, a book of history on Amîr Sulaymân b. Yıldırım Bâyezîd Khân – may God perpetuate their caliphates!). 'Atufî likely read the title as Cengnâme (The Book of War) and so misplaced it in the inventory's subsection of verse chronicles.

The latter is the edition of only the Khwarizm Turkish section of one of the manuscripts of the work. Remarkably, ‘Atufi does not designate the lan- guage of the interlinear translations here as “Mongolian,” although they were written in Eastern Turkic, more precisely Khwarazmian Turkic, which suggests that the designation “Mongolian” likely refers to the script and not the dialect.

 127. In order to better evaluate the role of Persian in the Ottoman enterprise, the discussion below also touches on dictionaries dedicated to other languages, mostly Arabic, that use Persian as a medium language.

 129. For example, the Ottoman Turkish word tercüme ("translation"), with a labial vowel in the second syllable, clearly reflects a Persian antecedent, tarjuma, and not Arabic tarjama with an illabial vowel in the same position.
 130. MS. Török F. 39, 296 {17}, 299 {12–13}; Asadī Tūsī, Kitāb-i lughat-i furs, ed. 'Abbās Iqbāl Āshtiyānī (Tehran: Asātir, 2010); Asadī's Neupersisches Wörterbuch Lughat-i Furs: Nach der einzigen Vaticanischen, ed. Paul Horn (Berlin: Weidmann Buchhandlung, 1897). As 'Atufi has no entries on other Persian monolingual dictionaries known from this early period, such as Qatran and Abu Hafṣ Sughdī's respective glossaries, we have to assume that these works must have been lost by his time. Remarkably, 'Atufi indicates the former copy (i.e., Török F. 39, 296 {17}) to be a translation into Persian, which—if our identification is correct—is a mistake, as the work itself was written in Persian. See also Storey, vol. 3, part 1, 3–4; Orhan Bilgin, "Esedī-i Tūsī," TDVİA 11 (1995): 370; Baevski 52–55; Elr, s.v. "Asadī Tūsī," by Jalal Khaleghi Motlagh.

Storey, vol. 3, part 1, 5–7; Baevski 55–57. In some of its extant manuscripts, the work is accompanied by Turkish interlinear notes. 133. There is another unidentifiable volume listed by 'Atufi (MS Török F. 59, 295 {18}), which might also be a Persian monolingual dictionary, but it is impossible to ascertain this with any degree of certainty: Kitāb 'alā tartīb ḥurūf al-tahajjī fī lughat al-furs (A Book on the Language of Persia Arranged according to the Letters of the Alphabet).

 139. Kitāb al-aḥkām fī al-lughā al-mutarjam bi-al-fārisiyya (Book on Verbs in the [Arabic] Language Translated into Persian), MS Török F. 59, 294 {15}.

There is a copy of the work at the Topkapı Palace Library (TSMK A. 2745, Karatay, A 7556, vol. 4, 22) executed on 18 Safar 633/9 November 1235 by one Ḥusayn b. Yūsuf b. al-Khiẓr b. al-Bugharī al-Khalatī, but we do not know whether it was already in the library during the reign of Bayezid II or was acquired later.

 143. Kitāb al-asmā' 'alā tartīb al-ḥurūf (Book of Nouns Arranged according to the Alphabet), MS Török F. 59, 298 {12–13}.
 144. MS Török F. 59, 294, {12}–{16}, 300 {16–17}. In one case (300 {14–16}), 'Atufi refers to Zamakhshari by his other name, Jarullah, which suggests that 'Atufi may not have considered this copy of the work to have been written by the same author as the Muqaddimat al-adab. For an edition, see Zamakhshari, Muqaddimat al-adab, ed. Mahdī Muḥaqqiq (Tehran: Mu'assasa-yi Muṭāla'āt-i Islāmī, 2007).  145. TSMK, A. 2243 (Karatay, A 7559, vol. 4, 23–24). On the basis of a death note for one Sharaf al-Dīn on 1b, this manuscript was copied around 776/1374; seal of Bayezid II. Arabic with Arabic explanatory marginalia and Eastern Turkic interlinear translations; the first two parts are consistently translated, but the third part has few Turkic translations. There is a colophon on 247a, likely by a hand different from that of the copyist, with the date 910/1504–5. TSMK, A. 2740; Chaghatay Turkic and Persian; according to Togan, it was copied in the mid-fourteenth century by one Shams of Khiva. TSMK, A. 2741 (Karatay, A 7561, vol. 4, 24). Persian and—at least according to Togan—also Eastern Turkic interlinear translation, although I have not been able to find any of the latter. The colophon at the end of a short treatise titled Miftāḥ al-najāt in Arabic is written in a different hand between chapters 2 and 3 of Zamakhshari's work (fols. 102a–103a), dated 890/1485–86 (fol. 158), but we do not know when the manuscript made its way into the Ottoman palace library. On manuscripts of the work with Eastern Turkic interlinear translation, see Zeki Velidi Togan, "Zimahşeri'nin [sic] Doğu Türkçesi ile «Muḥaddimetü'l-'edeb»i," Türkiyat Mecmuası 14 (1965): 81–92.
 146. MS Török F. 59, 300 {5–6}. According to 'Atufi, it is only the first volume of the work, down to the letter ṣād. See Storey, vol. 3, part 1, 87; Ahmed Ateş, "Hicrî VI.-VIII. (XII.-XIV.) Asırlarda Anadolu'da Farsça Eserler," Türkiyat Mecmuası, 7–8, no. 2 (1945): 94–135; Munzavī 2013–14.

Also multilingual, though presently unidentifiable, are the works included in another volume, titled Mulḥaqāt Dānistan min al-lughā al-rūmiyya wa-al-sarfiyya (Appendices of the Dānistan [Book of Knowledge?] from Greek and Serbian) and Risālat ḥikāyat Qirīsūs bi-khattʿ arabī wa-ghayrihī wa-awraq fihā khuṭūṭ mukhtalifa (The Story of Qirisūs in the Arabic and Other Scripts, and pages with various writings on them.) The latter work is described by ʿAtufi as using other scripts—possibly Greek, Syriac, and Glagolitic—apart from Arabic, but we do not know exactly which scripts are used (MS Török F. 59, 297 {1}).

 158. MS Török F. 59, 296 {3–8}.  160. “Risāla fi al-lughā al-fahlawīyya” (A Treatise on the Fahlawīyya Language), unknown NW Iranian dialect, MS Török F. 59, 298 {19}. The volume also contains Shams Khattat Balkhī’s (fourteenth century) Kanz al-zawāhir fi maʿrifat al-jawāhir (Treasury of Flowers in Knowledge about Jewels). According to the catalogue of the library holding the manuscript, it is the Persian translation of a quasi-Aristotelian alchemical treatise titled Dhahīrat Iskandar or Dhahīrat Aristātālīs. Cf.  163. TSMK A. 2732, seal of Bayezid II (Karatay, F 304, 116). The inside of the cover has the slightly different title, Majmaʿ al-lughāt. The order of the individual titles in the manuscript differs from how ʿAtufi gives them in the inventory. Aside from the dictionaries discussed below, the manuscript also contains a short treatise on law written in Arabic by the compiler of the anthology: Risāla fi maktūbāt sharʿiyya (Treatise of Writings on Holy Law), MS Török F. 59, 298 {9}; TSMK A. 2732, 105b–121a.
 164. MS Török F. 59, 298 {10–11}; TSMK A. 2732, fols. 241b–262b; MS Török F. 59, 298 {11}; TSMK A. 2732, fols. 263b–296a.
 165. MS Török F. 59, 298 {9–10}; TSMK A. 2732, fols. 121b–207b. Remarkably, the Aydınid ruler İsa Beg (r. ca. 760–792/1360–1390) had four copies of the work in his library (Sara Nur Yıldız, “Aydınid Court Literature in the Formation of an Islamic Identity in Fourteenth-Century Western Anatolia,” 233); Storey, vol. 3, part 1, 95–96.
 166. MS Török F. 59, 298 {10}; TSMK A. 2732, fols. 209b–238a. The copy is dedicated to one ʿAlaʾ al-Dawla wa-al-Din, whose identity is unknown. According to the preface, his patron commissioned the work to supersede the rhyming dictionaries of Abu Nasr Farahi and Husam al-Din Khoiy.
 167. MS Török F. 59, 298 {11–12}; TSMK A. 2732, fols. 297b–350a. The authorship of the work is slightly problematic. Aside from Ahmed-i Daʿi, other manuscripts indicate ʿAbd al-Jalil

- b. Rashid al-Din 'Umar al-Waṭwati or Rashid al-Din al-Qawi 'Abd al-Jalil b. 'Umar al-Waṭwati as the author. See Storey, vol. 3, part 1, 86–87. According to the preface, this work is a metrical version of Watwati's Ḥamd u ṣanā.
168. Kitāb al-asmā' 'alā tartīb al-ḥurūf (Book of Nouns in Alphabetical Order), MS Török F. 59, 298 {6}; TSMK A. 2732, fols. 1b–40a. 170. "Risālat al-amthila al-taṣrīfiyya bi-al-quyūd al-turkiyya" (A Treatise of Morphological Examples According to the Rules of Turkish), MS Török F. 59, 298 {8–9}; TSMK A. 2732, fols. 97b–104b.

172. MS Török F. 59, 298 {12–18}. The volume also contains a treatise on accountancy, titled "Ashkāl al-ḥisāb min al-siyāqat" (The Forms of Calculating in Accountancy), which remains to be identified (MS Török F. 59, 298 {17–18}).

141. “Kitāb mukātabāt al-wazīr al-Jazarī fī al-tarassul” (The Correspondence of al-Jazarī the Vizier), 218 {8}. According to Erünsal, it is in Turkish, and the author is Cezeri Kasım Paşa; cf. Erünsal, “Abdürrahim Karahisârî,” TDVİA, vol. 1 (1988), 291–92.
142. [Maḥmūd b. Edhem Amasyavî (fifteenth century)]. Gülşen-i inşā‘ (Rose Garden of Epistolography), Turkish, 219 {5–6}. MANUSCRIPT: Milli Kütüphane, Yz. A. 2276; Süleymaniye, Kadızade Mehmed 421, autograph copy from 901/1496.

146. Ḥalīmī (d. late fifteenth century). Kitāb fī ‘ilm al-‘arūḍ (Book on the Science of Poetic Meter), Turkish and Persian, 225 {3}. Probably identical with the third part of Ḥalīmī’s Baḥr al-gharā’ib, also known as Lūgat-i Ḥalīmī, which has the heading Ṣanā’iyi-‘i şī‘riyye ve kavā’id-i bed‘iyye.
147. “Kitāb dābiṭat-i ḥall-i mu‘ammā” (The Rules of Solving Riddles), 225 {17}. Probably not in Turkish but in Arabic, notwithstanding Erünsal’s claim (see his “908 [1502] Tarihli Saray Kütüphanesi Kataloğu ve Türk Edebiyatı Tarihine Kaynak Olarak Önemi,” 273).
148. Kāmī. Dīwān, 225 {17}. Unclear which Kāmī it is. Perhaps: Sehi Beg 292. However, ‘Atufi gives no language designation, which strongly suggests it may have been in Arabic, for the item is listed among Arabic diwans.

PERSIAN DIVANS (al-dawāwīn al-fārisiyya)

149. Cem Sultān (d. 1495). Dīwān, likely in both Persian and Turkish, 244 {19}. MANUSCRIPT: TSMK, R. 739, seal of Selim I (Karatay, T 2282, vol. 2, 98–99); Süleymaniye, Fatih 3794. EDITION (of his Turkish poetry): İ. Halil Ersoylu, Cem Sultān’ın Türkçe Dīvanı, Ankara: Atatürk, Kültür, Dil ve Tarih Yüksek Kurumu, 1989.
150. Şeyh Vefā (Muşlihu’d-Dīn Muştafā, d. 1491). Dīwān, 245 {19}–246 {1}. Probably the same as Risāle-yi manẓūmāt-i Şeyh Vefā (Süleymaniye, Fatih 3899, Arabic, Persian, and Turkish; seal of Bayezid II).
151. Zātī (d. 1546?). Dīwān, 246 {11}. EDITION (of the Turkish part): Ali Nihad Tarlan, Mehmed Çavuşoğlu, and M. Ali Tanyeri, Zatî Divanı: Edisyon Kritik ve Transkripsiyon, Istanbul: İstanbul

Üniversitesi, Edebiyat Fakültesi, 1967). This might also very well be a different Zātī, and thus this volume is probably in Persian.

152. Amīrī. Dīwān, 246 {12}. Likely the Persian dīwān of the Timurid poet Yūsuf Amīrī (Süleymaniye, Ayasofya 3883 [copyist: Sharaf al-Dīn Ḥusayn; dedicatee: Pīr Budaq Qaraqoyunlu, seal: Shahzade Meḥmed son of Bayezid II]). Although less likely, the item could also refer to an Ottoman poet (cf. Sehi Beg, 162–63).
153. La'li (d. before 1538–39?). Dīwān, Turkish (and probably also Persian), 246 {16}.
154. Firākī. Dīwān, 246 {17}. Probably mainly Persian; cf. Latīfī, Tezkiretū'ş-Şuarâ ve Tabsıratu'n-Nuzamâ, ed. Rıdvan Canım, Ankara: Atatürk Kültür, Dil ve Tarih Yüksek Kurumu, 2000, 423–24.
155. Le'ālī. Dīwān, Persian and Turkish dīwāns in the same volume, 246 {18}. MANUSCRIPT: Süleymaniye, Hacı Mahmud Efendi 3298, fols. 41b–103a, on the margins (only his Turkish dīwān). EDITION: Gülçiçek Korkut, “Divân-i Le'ālī: İnceleme-Metin,” master's thesis, Hacettepe Üniversitesi, Sosyal Bilimler Enstitüsü, 2004. See also: Sehi Beg, 207–8.
156. Qabūlī (d. 1478). Dīwān, 246 {19}. MANUSCRIPTS: TSMK, H. 884 (Karatay, F 677, 233–34), seal of Bayezid II. Mostly in Persian. EDITION: Qabūlī-i Haravī, Dīwān-i Qabūlī-i Haravī: Bar Asās-i Chāp-i 'Aks-i Ismā'īl Hikmat Artāylān, Tehran: Bunyād-i Mawqūfāt-i Duktur Maḥmūd Afshār, 2007; Elif Namoglu, “Fatih Dönemi Şairi Kabūlī'nin İkinci Farsca Divanı: Metin-İnceleme” (PhD diss., İstanbul Üniversitesi, 2018).
157. Āhī. Dīwān, 246 {19}, likely mainly Persian. See: Sehi Beg, 265–66. Erünsal, “908 (1502) Tarihli Saray Kütüphanesi Kataloğu ve Türk Edebiyatı Tarihine Kaynak Olarak Önemi,” 273.
158. Başırī. Dīwān, Persian [and Turkish], 247 {8}. MANUSCRIPT: Süleymaniye, Âşir Efendi 292, fols. 229b–89b.
159. Dā'ī. Dīwān, 247 {13}, in his own hand. The entry is in the list of Persian divans and does not indicate any other language. It may therefore belong to another, Persophone, Dā'ī, especially because the Dīwān of Aḥmed-i Dā'ī, the Turkish poet, features among the Turkish divans in the inventory. EDITION: Mehmet Özmen, Ahmed-i Da'i Divanı, Ankara: Türk Dil Kurumu, 2001.
160. Cihānşāh-i Ḥākikī (d. 1467). Dīwān, 248 {1}. MANUSCRIPT: Süleymaniye, Fatih 3808.
161. Ṭālī'ī. Dīwān, 248 {1}. See Sehi Beg, 223–24.
162. Şeyh Vefā (Muşlihu'd-Dīn Muşṭafā, d. 1491)? Dīwān, 248 {1–2}. See above.
163. Vişālī. Dīwān, 248 {2}. See Sehi Beg, 237–38.
164. Ḥāmidī (d. 1485). Dīwān, 248 {4}. MANUSCRIPT: Türk Tarih Kurumu, no. 68; İstanbul Arkeoloji Müzesi 1184. EDITION: İsmail Hikmet Ertaylan, Külliyat-ı Divan-ı Mevlana Hamidi, İstanbul: İstanbul Üniversitesi Edebiyat Fakültesi, 1949. For his Turkish poetry, cf. İsmail Ünver, “Hāmidī'nin Türkçe Şiirleri,” Türkoloji Dergisi 6, no. 1 (1974): 197–233.
165. Aḥmed-i Dā'ī (? d. after 1421). Kitāb sitta (Six Books), 248 {5} (?). Probably mainly Persian, but presumed to be Turkish in: Erünsal, “908 (1502) Tarihli Saray Kütüphanesi Kataloğu ve Türk Edebiyatı Tarihine Kaynak Olarak Önemi,” 273.
166. Karamānī Meḥmed Paşa, penname “Nişānī” (d. 1481). Qaṣā'id wa-ghazaliyyāt (Qaṣīdas and Ghazals), 248 {7}. Probably mainly in Persian; see Sehi Beg, 117–18.
167. Havā'ī. Qaṣā'id (Qaṣīdas), 248 {7}. Probably mainly in Persian, but presumed by Erünsal to be in Turkish (see his “908 [1502] Tarihli Saray Kütüphanesi Kataloğu ve Türk Edebiyatı Tarihine Kaynak Olarak Önemi,” 273).
168. Havā'ī. Kitāb Khayāl wa-Wiṣāl (Book of Fancy and Attainment), 248 {7–8}. Probably mainly in Persian, but listed by Erünsal as Turkish (see his “908 [1502] Tarihli Saray Kütüphanesi Kataloğu ve Türk Edebiyatı Tarihine Kaynak Olarak Önemi,” 273).

169. “Qaṣīdatān fī madḥ Sulṭān al-Salāṭīn Sulṭān Bāyezīd Khān -a‘ānahū al-musta‘ān” (Qaṣīdas by Riyāḍī in Praise of the Sultan of Sultans Sultan Bāyezīd Khān [i.e., Bayezid II], May the One Whose Aid Is Sought Be Preoccupied with Him!), 248 {8–9}. Probably Persian, but listed by Erünsal as Turkish (“908 [1502] Tarihli Saray Kütüphanesi Kataloğu ve Türk Edebiyatı Tarihine Kaynak Olarak Önemi,” 273).
170. [Muḥammad ‘Aṣṣār-i Tabrizī]. Mihr-i Mushtarī, [Persian], 249 {16–17}. Probably more correctly: Mihr va Mushtarī (Sun and Jupiter). MANUSCRIPT: Süleymaniye, Fatih 4130, an illustrated copy with the seal of Bayezid II, date and place: 894/1488-89, Shiraz; TSMK, A. 3563 (Karatay, F 618, 213), miniatures, 887/1482, Turkmen-Shiraz, copyist: Na‘īm al-Dīn b. Ṣadr al-Dīn Kātīb; seal of Bayezid II. A vignette on fol. 1a states that the copy is from the library of Bayezid II; it is dedicated to Bayezid II in the back. Erünsal indexes the work as Turkish (see his “908 [1502] Tarihli Saray Kütüphanesi Kataloğu ve Türk Edebiyatı Tarihine Kaynak Olarak Önemi,” 273), but if our identification is correct, it is in Persian.
171. “Naẓm Qīṣṣa-yi Sulṭān Bāyezīd Khān -khallada Allāhu ta‘ālā khilāfatahū” (Verse about the Legend of Sultan Bayezid Khan—May God Most High Perpetuate His Caliphate!), likely in Persian, 249 {19}.
172. [Muḥammad ‘Aṣṣār-i Tabrizī]. Mihr-i Mushtarī. Probably more correctly: Mihr va Mushtarī (Sun and Jupiter), Persian, no. 170, 250 {1}. See above.
173. Ṣabā‘ī. Rāḥat al-‘ushshāq, ma‘a ash‘ārihī (Solace of Lovers, with [Ṣabā‘ī’s] Poetry)], Persian, 250 {12}. Erünsal is probably mistaken to think that it is in Turkish (see his “908 [1502] Tarihli Saray Kütüphanesi Kataloğu ve Türk Edebiyatı Tarihine Kaynak Olarak Önemi,” 273); Sehi Beg, 206–7.
174. “Naẓm-i ghazānāma-yi Rūm fī tawārīkh-i Meḥammed Khān bin Murād Khān-ṭāba tharāhumā” (Book of the Conquest of Rum, about the History of Mehmed II, son of Murad II—May Their Dust Be Fragrant!), Persian, 250 {15–16}. Erünsal (“908 [1502] Tarihli Saray Kütüphanesi Kataloğu ve Türk Edebiyatı Tarihine Kaynak Olarak Önemi,” 273), probably mistakenly, thinks it is in Turkish.
175. “Naẓm-i tawārīkh Sulṭān Meḥammed Khān b. Murād Khān -khullidat khilāfatuhum -wa-ghayruhū” (Verse History of Mehmed II son of Murad II—May Their Caliphate Be Eternal!), Persian, 251 {5–6}. Erünsal wrongly designates it as Turkish (“908 [1502] Tarihli Saray Kütüphanesi Kataloğu ve Türk Edebiyatı Tarihine Kaynak Olarak Önemi,” 273).
176. “Kitāb-i naẓm-i tawārīkh-i Sulṭān Meḥammed Khān-ṭāba tharāhu” (Verse History of Mehmed II—May His Dust Be Fragrant!), Persian, 251 {14–15}. Erünsal wrongly designates it as Turkish (“908 [1502] Tarihli Saray Kütüphanesi Kataloğu ve Türk Edebiyatı Tarihine Kaynak Olarak Önemi,” 273).
177. “Kitāb-i qalandarnāma” (Book of Vagrant Dervishes), Persian, 252 {2}. Erünsal wrongly designates it as Turkish in “908 (1502) Tarihli Saray Kütüphanesi Kataloğu ve Türk Edebiyatı Tarihine Kaynak Olarak Önemi,” 273.
178. Aḥmedī. Kitāb-i ḥikāyat-i Ḥusayn wa-Yazīd (Story of Ḥusayn and Yazīd), Persian, 253 {1–2}. Erünsal wrongly designates it as Turkish in “908 (1502) Tarihli Saray Kütüphanesi Kataloğu ve Türk Edebiyatı Tarihine Kaynak Olarak Önemi,” 273.
179. Kāshifī. Fatḥnāma-i Eḡriboz (Book of the Conquest of Euboea), Persian (?), 253 {19}.
180. Kāshifī. Naẓm-i ḥikāyat-i Shayb wa-Ḥabīb (Verse Story of Shayb and Ḥabīb), 253 {19}–254 {1}. Erünsal wrongly designates it as Turkish in “908 (1502) Tarihli Saray Kütüphanesi Kataloğu ve Türk Edebiyatı Tarihine Kaynak Olarak Önemi,” 274.

181. "Majmū'at ash'ār afādil al-shu'arā" (Anthology of Poems by the Most Virtuous Poets), 10 copies, Persian (?), (254 {6–10}). Erünsal designates it as Turkish in "908 (1502) Tarihli Saray Kütüphanesi Kataloğu ve Türk Edebiyatı Tarihine Kaynak Olarak Önemi," 274.
182. "Naẓm-i qışṣa-yi ibtidā'-i khilāfat-i Sultān al-Salāṭīn Sultān Bāyezīd Khān -a'ānahū al-musta'ān" (Story of the Beginning of the Caliphate of the Sultan of Sultans, Bayezid Khan—May the One Whose Aid Is Begged Succor Him!), Persian, 254 {19}. Erünsal designates it as Turkish in "908 (1502) Tarihli Saray Kütüphanesi Kataloğu ve Türk Edebiyatı Tarihine Kaynak Olarak Önemi," 274.
183. "Midḥat Sultān al-Salāṭīn Sultān Bāyezīd Khān -a'ānahū al-musta'ān" (Praise of the Sultan of Sultans, Sultan Bayezid Khan—May the One Whose Aid Is Begged Succor Him!), Persian, 255 {2–3}. Erünsal designates it as Turkish in "908 (1502) Tarihli Saray Kütüphanesi Kataloğu ve Türk Edebiyatı Tarihine Kaynak Olarak Önemi," 274.
184. Zāti. Kitāb-i shikāyatnāma (Book of Complaint), Persian (?), 255 {7}. Erünsal designates it as Turkish written by the famous Ottoman poet (d. 1546) (see his "908 [1502] Tarihli Saray Kütüphanesi Kataloğu ve Türk Edebiyatı Tarihine Kaynak Olarak Önemi," 274), but in fact, it may well be by another Zāti and is probably in Persian.
185. Qabūli. Kitāb-i baḥth-i Kūn wa Kus (Contest of the Arse and the Pussy), Persian, 255 {7}. Erünsal, likely mistakenly, designates it as Turkish in "908 (1502) Tarihli Saray Kütüphanesi Kataloğu ve Türk Edebiyatı Tarihine Kaynak Olarak Önemi," 274.
186. "Risāla fī madḥ Sultān al-Salāṭīn Sultān Bāyezīd Khān -a'ānahū al-musta'ān" (Treatise in Praise of Sultan Bayezid—May the One Whose Aid Is Begged Succor Him!), 257 {7–8}. Probably in Persian, though likely mistakenly designated as Turkish in Erünsal, "908 (1502) Tarihli Saray Kütüphanesi Kataloğu ve Türk Edebiyatı Tarihine Kaynak Olarak Önemi," 274.

According to Erünsal, "909 (1503) Tarihli Defter-i Kütüb," 255, n. 16, the work is identical with Ayasofya 3596 (copied in 713/1313); however, that manuscript is in Persian and the work itself was written by Rashīd al-Dīn. EDITION: Türk Şiveleri Lügatı (Dīvānū Luḡāt-it-Türk), ed. and trans. Robert Dankoff and James Kelly, 3 vols., Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1982–85.
231. Volume containing multiple works. Most certainly identical with the Jāmi‘ al-lughāt, copied in 870/1465–66, by Sirāj b. Ṭayyib b. Aḥmad, secretary at the law court of Edirne. MANUSCRIPT: TSMK, A. 2732 (Karatay F. 304, 116, who misreads the date of the manuscript as 867); seal of Bayezid II; fol. 1b has the seal of Ahmed III. The order of the individual titles in the manuscript is slightly different from how ‘Atufi gives them. Contents:
- 231a. “Kitāb al-asmā’ ‘alā tartīb al-ḥurūf” (Book of Nouns in Alphabetical Order), Arabic with interlinear Persian translation, 298 {6}. The title page has: Asmā-yi šāḥib al-Kashshāf (Nouns from the author of the Kashshāf), likely alluding to a glossary of nouns in alphabetical order from al-Zamakhsharī’s al-Kashshāf ‘an ḥaqā’iq al-tanzīl (The Unveiler of the Truths of the Revelation), fols. 1b–40a—copied by Sirāj b. Ṭayyib al-Ṣūnisā’ī on 3 Rabi‘ I 870/November 3, 1465.
- 231b. “Kitāb al-lughā al-fārisiyya ‘alā tartīb al-ḥurūf wa-al-ḥarakāt” (Book on the Persian Language Arranged in Alphabetical Order and according to Vowel Signs), Persian, 298 {6–7}. Persian verbs with interlinear Turkish translations, followed by a grammar of Persian verbs, then nouns in alphabetical order. The title page has: “Lujja-yi (?) Pīr Ḥamīd al-Sivāsī,” fols. 41b–78a.
- 231c. Sirāj b. Ṭayyib al-Ṣūnisā’ī. Kitāb al-lughā al-turkiyya al-mutarjam bi-al-fārisiyya ‘alā tartīb al-ḥurūf wa-al-ḥarakāt (Book on the Turkish Language Arranged in Alphabetical Order and according to Vowel Signs), Persian, 298 {7–8}; fols. 79b–96b, copied at the beginning of Rajab 870/1466.
- 231d. “Risālat al-amthila al-taṣrīfiyya bi-al-quyūd al-turkiyya” (A Treatise on Morphological Examples According to the Rules of Turkish), Arabic (?), 298 {8–9}.
- 231e. “Risāla fī maktūbāt shar‘iyya” (Treatise on Writings on Holy Law), 298 {9}.
- 231f. [Aḥmedī, d. 1412–13]. Mirqāt al-adab (The Staircase to Literature), Arabic and Persian, versified, 298 {9–10}. There is some confusion about its authorship: according to the TDVİA, it was compiled by Aḥmedī of Germiyan; according to Storey (vol. 3, part 1, 95–96), by Aḥmadī of Kirmān.
- 231g. Muḥammad b. al-Bavvāb. Tuḥfa-yi ‘alā’ī (Lofty Gift), Arabic and Persian, versified, 298 {10}.
- 231h. Abū Naṣr Farāhī (d. 1242). Niṣāb al-ṣibyān (Basics for Youth), [Arabic and Persian], verse, 298 {10–11}. EDITION: Abū Naṣr Farāhī, Niṣāb al-ṣibyān, 2nd edition, ed. Muḥammad Javād Mashkūr, Tehran: Sāzmān-i Intishārāt-i Ashrafī, 1975.
- 231i. Ḥusām al-Dīn Ḥasan b. ‘Abd al-Mu‘min al-Khoyī. Naṣīb al-fityān (The Allotment of Youth), [Arabic and Persian], versified glossary, 298 {11}.
- 231j. [Aḥmed-i Dā’ī, d. after 1421]. Uqūd al-jawāhir (Garlands of Jewels), [Arabic and Persian], verse, 298 {11–12}. Its authorship is problematic: aside from Aḥmed-i Dā’ī, other manuscripts indicate ‘Abd al-Jalīl b. Rashīd al-Dīn ‘Umar al-Waṭwātī—or Rashīd al-Dīn al-Qawī ‘Abd al-Jalīl b. ‘Umar al-Waṭwātī—as the author. See Storey, vol. 3, part 1, 86–87.
- 231k. [Aḥmed-i Dā’ī, d. after 1421, or Bū Ja‘farak, d. 1150]. Ḥamd u thanā (Praise and Encomium), Arabic and Persian, 298 {12}. Karatay attributes the work to Aḥmed-i Dā’ī; Storey (vol. 3, part 1, 85–86) to Bū Ja‘farak.

BOOKS ON OCCULT SCIENCES

The 129 codices recorded in this section (tafṣīl) of the palace library inventory include more than 200 copies of texts on a diverse range of topics: oneiromancy (‘ilm al-ta’bīr), physiognomy (‘ilm al-firāsa), alchemy (‘ilm al-kīmiyā), the occult properties of stones (‘ilm al-aḥjār), the divinatory method known as geomancy (‘ilm al-raml), omens or bibliomancy (al-fāl),¹ the interrelated “magical” arts of talismans (al-ṭilsimāt), nīranj,² and sīmiyā,³ the adjuration of spirits (‘azā’im), the political-eschatological divinatory discourse known as jafr; the manufacture of wondrous automata and related devices (ṣinā’at al-‘ajā’ib, al-ḥiyal), and siḥr, another term usually glossed as “magic” or “sorcery.” A final category of works on “wondrous matters” (al-umūr al-‘ajība) is found as well, though the heading is noted only in the margin and not in the table of contents at the head of the inventory. The subjects of this section thus roughly fit within the rubric of what modern scholarship calls “occult sciences,” a term for which various cognates are found in Arabic and Persian: “the strange sciences” (al-‘ulūm al-gharība), “the hidden sciences” (al-‘ulūm al-khafiyya), “the sciences of the concealed” (‘ulūm al-ghayba), etc. ‘Atufi employs none of these phrases, however, giving the section no overarching title.

Learned discourses on the occult sciences have a lengthy history in Islamicate thought.⁴ They comprised a significant portion of the texts brought into Arabic during the Abbasid translation movement of the eighth to tenth centuries and were cultivated thereafter in various milieux. Astrology—notably absent from this section, as discussed below—enjoyed a prominent place at many Muslim courts from early on,⁵ while the others survived mostly as minor sciences for the first several centuries of Islamicate history, often in “associat[ion] with unsavoury doctrinal, confessional, and social spaces,” as Aziz al-Azmeh has put it.⁶ This state of affairs changed considerably over the first few centuries of the “post-classical” or mature period, roughly from the twelfth century onward, during which the occult sciences gained a new prominence and coherence. This is because they were integral to a new cosmological imaginary that rose to prominence during that time, which was emanationist, analogist,⁷ and often millenarian in outlook. In this newly regnant vision of the cosmos, the stars, planets, plants, minerals, bodily humors, colors, scents, letters of the alphabet, numbers, nations, and countless other entities and accidents of creation were enmeshed in a web of sympathetic or antipathetic relationships that vibrated along the “great chain of being” between the godhead and the manifest world.⁸ The occult sciences “made sense” within this collective apprehension of the nature of reality, as they represented much of the operational knowledge of the powers and meanings of things within this web of hidden—that is, “occult”—connections that ordered the cosmos. Furthermore, knowledge of these secrets was often seen as crucial to preparing for the trials of the impending end times. This is not to say that no Muslim thinkers of the period objected to the occult sciences on religio-moral or scientific grounds, but those who did were swimming against the tide.⁹

This new cosmological imaginary of the mature period has been variously described in modern scholarship: by Fazlur Rahman, for example, as “philosophic religion,” and more recently by Shahab Ahmed as “the Sufi-philosophical amalgam.”¹⁰ Matthew Melvin-Koushki’s account of the rising “neopythagoreanism” of this period also captures crucial elements of these developments.¹¹

This emerging Weltbild drew heavily on the late antique Platonic and Hermetic inheritances brought into Arabic in the Abbasid period, but was also shaped considerably by the bold claims of Muslim philosophers and mystics regarding their abilities to penetrate the unseen. Rahman and Ahmed both identify Ibn Sina (d. 1037), Shihab al-Din al-Suhrawardi (d. 1191), and Muhyi al-Din Ibn al-ʿArabi (d. 1240) as central contributors to this intellectual current. Their conjoined impact stems from the fact that, however disparate their systems of thought in certain respects, a basic isomorphism prevails in their visions of the cosmos as emanational and complexly shot through with hierarchies of being(s) and powers, sympathies and antipathies—a similarity seized upon by later commentators who worked to synthesize and reconcile their ideas. Such cosmological concepts had long been cultivated among various Islamicate philosophical, sectarian, and mystical communities, but the upheavals to the status quo of religious and political authority wrought by such civilizational cataclysms as the Crusades, the Reconquista, the Mongol invasions, and the Black Death helped clear the ground to expose these concepts to a much larger audience, while also bringing to the fore their potential eschatological significance. The Sufi orders, which rose to fill many gaps in the post-Mongol religio-political landscape and whose systems of graded spiritual authority were seen to embody notions of cosmic hierarchy, played a major role in the spread and popularization of this worldview beyond the small literate circles in which it formerly had been cultivated.¹² The ensuing embrace by many rulers of millenarian narratives and various titles and symbols of sacred kingship was at least equally important in establishing these ideas in the collective consciousness, as well as in encouraging through patronage their ongoing elaboration by intellectuals and cultural producers of various stripes.¹³ The occult sciences were prominent among the applied disciplines of this new vision of the cosmos and were increasingly “sanctified” within it, which is to say that they were linked to prophetic and saintly modes of supernatural power. The public cultivation of these disciplines, both through mastery of the older strata of literature and production of original works, thus became a largely respectable calling in the late medieval and early modern periods. In sum, it would be strange not to find a significant collection of works on the occult sciences in the inventory of a Muslim ruler’s library at the turn of the sixteenth century.

A key element of the rise of this cosmology was a shift in views about pre-Islamic knowledge that permitted the idea of the ancient sages having tasted some degree of divine inspiration. John Walbridge has discussed this development under the heading of “Platonic Orientalism”: the search by Muslim thinkers for the prisca theologia concealed in the symbols and writings of the ancients—or, more accurately, in the large body of Platonic, Pythagorean, Hermetic, and Aristotelian pseudepigrapha that survived from late antiquity.¹⁴ Walbridge’s focus is on the aforementioned Shihab al-Din al-Suhrawardi, though earlier and later examples of other such thinkers can be enumerated, from the writings of the Basran collective that referred to itself as the “Brethren of Purity” (ikhwān al-ṣafāʾ) to early Ottoman figures such as the Antiochene Sufi and occultist ʿAbd al-Rahman al-Bistami (d. 1454)—himself much influenced by both the Brethren and al-Suhrawardi—and numerous of his contemporaries.¹⁵ While classical-era Sunni thinkers had tended to draw sharp distinctions between Islamic and non-Islamic knowledge, relegating the latter to legitimacy only with reference to this-worldly concerns, the “Platonic Orientalists” saw flashes or patterns of divine truth in various aspects of pagan metaphysics and religious doctrines. In doing so, they recognized the ancient sages as anticipating the supreme truth of the teachings of the Qurʾan and the Prophet Muhammad while conversely drawing on the wisdom of the ancients to discern a body of secret knowledge encoded in Islamic scriptures but concealed from the vulgus of common Muslims. Thus, they posited an esoteric tradition within Islam that was directly descended from one extending into the ancient, and pagan, past. This trend, which arguably first arose in the context of Shiʿi bāṭin-ism (the notion of hidden levels of meaning in the Qurʾan and, for some thinkers, other aspects of religious thought and practice), was thence taken up within the “philosophical mysticism” of later Sufism, the strong “Neoplatonic” (viz. emanationist and analogist) coloring of which is well known to modern scholarship.¹⁶

Part and parcel of this reframing of pre-Islamic knowledge was a shift from the classical trend of considering the occult sciences as belonging strictly to the natural sciences (al-ʿulūm al-ṭabīʿiyya) to a new tendency of associating them with sacral power (walāya), as Liana Saif, Melvin-Koushki, and the present author have discussed elsewhere.¹⁷ The (somewhat rare) classical-era defenders of the occult sciences had posed them as bodies of knowledge about the created world drawn by the ancients and their Muslim imitators through inference from experience, an epistemic mode quite distinct from prophetic revelation and bereft of any significant religio-moral authority. Later proponents of occultism, however, blurred this distinction, often linking the occult sciences to prophecy or lesser forms of divine inspiration (kashf, ilhām, maʿrifa, etc.). Perhaps the greatest beneficiary of this transition was the Kabbalah-like “science of letters and names” (ʿilm al-hurūf wa-al-asmāʾ), which recent scholarship shorthands as “lettrism,” that was introduced to the central Islamic lands by thinkers such as Ibn al-ʿArabi and the Ifriqiyan-cum-Egyptian Sufi Ahmad al-Buni (d. 1225 or 1232–33). This is a mystico-magical discourse on the relationship between divine speech and manifest reality which in certain renderings, most famously al-Buni’s, includes methods of devising talismanic figures involving the names of God, mathematical “magic squares” (awfāq, sing. wafq), and astrological timing to achieve various ends—techniques vouchsafed by the practitioner’s high spiritual state. While initially an esoteric praxis restricted to certain Sufi cliques, it became widely popularized in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, and eventually was widely recognized as a licit, indeed sanctified body of knowledge on the workings of God’s creation and the occult manipulation thereof.¹⁸ The special status afforded to lettrism is demonstrated by that fact that ʿAtufi lists several of al-Buni’s works near the beginning of the inventory, mostly in a section on prayers, invocations, the occult qualities (khawāṣṣ) of the Qurʾān, and “magic” squares (awfāq) that is included among sections on the most cherished religious sciences (25 {9}, 48 {2, 10, 12, 15, 16, 17, 18}, 49 {10, 15}, 50 {5, 7, 8, 17}).¹⁹ Such a move would have shocked some Muslim thinkers of previous periods. Indeed, in a well-known critique of lettrism written a little more than a century before ʿAtufi compiled his inventory, the historian Ibn Khaldun argued in his al-Muqaddima that, contrary to its proponents’ claims that lettrism was a divinely-approved “science of the saints,”²⁰ it was inescapably tainted by pagan astral-magical techniques (of the sort discussed explicitly in some of the works listed in this section) and therefore was an execrable form of sorcery according to Islamic law.²¹ This argument, which relies on a stark distinction between Islamic and pagan knowledge, was already outmoded among the largely occultophilic learned elites of Mamluk Cairo. The aforementioned ʿAbd al-Rahman al-Bistami, for example, a near-contemporary of Ibn Khaldun and denizen of both Cairo and Bursa, some of whose writings are included in the inventory (48 {3}, 50 {12}, 303 {12–13}), heralded lettrism not only as a science possessed by the greatest Sufi saints, but as the secret teachings of a line of initiates that included Plato, Pythagoras, Hermes-Idris, Abraham, et alia, all of whom had been afforded their knowledge by divine dispensation.²² For al-Bistami and many of his contemporaries, it was no accident of history that the reconciliation of ancient and Islamic learning through revelation of the formerly secret tradition of lettrism was occurring in their own period, but rather this constituted proof of the approaching end of time.²³

This is not to say that al-Bistami and his ilk considered all the teachings of the ancients or all the occult sciences to be of the same vaunted status as lettrism—else we would not expect to see these topics relegated to their own section in ʿAtufi’s inventory, quite apart from the religious sciences among which lettrism is nestled. As Melvin-Koushki discusses in his detailed study of the occult sciences in the Islamicate discourse on the “classification of the sciences” (taṣnīf al-ʿulūm), the epistemic position of the individual occult sciences was quite fluid throughout the late medieval and early modern periods.²⁴ Timurid and Safavid classificatory thinkers operating within the rising “neoplatonic-neopythagorean” trend of the new cosmology tended to promote astrology, lettrism, and geomancy to the status of mathematical sciences. This category, to their way of thinking, was at once more philosophical and more divine than that of the inductive “natural sciences” to which Ibn Sina and others had relegated most occult discourses. Ottoman thinkers, on the other hand, typically stuck closer to Ibn Sina’s view. In this regard, ʿAtufi’s scheme seems something of a mixed bag: lettrism as a religious science, astrology as a mathematical science (thus its exclusion from this section of the inventory), and the remainder of the occult sciences in another category that can perhaps be taken as consonant with Ibn Sina's position that they are inductive natural sciences. It is also conceivable that 'Atufi was influenced by al-Bistami's thinking on the division of the sciences,²⁵ which seems to have been strongly influenced by the aforementioned Epistles of the Brethren of Purity, also featured in the palace library inventory (319 {9–14}, 324 {2–5}). Al-Bistami designates several occult discourses, including sihr (which, following the Brethren, he probably saw as inclusive of the art of talismanry), the exorcism/evocation of spirits (azā'im), bibliomancy (al-fa'l), alchemy, and the engineering of wondrous devices (al-ḥiyāl) as riyādī, which is to say “propaedeutic” or “practical,” sciences. He also includes in this category such non-occult disciplines as lexicology (al-lughā) and grammar (al-naḥw), biography (siyar) and history (ta'rikh), and the chancery arts (ilm al-kitāba), among others. He seems to consider all of these to be “outer” sciences and applied knowledge discourses that are of practical use, but that are also propaedeutic in the sense that they contain evidentiary glimpses of the higher truths of revelation and genuine philosophy.

Ultimately, of course, 'Atufi was acting as a librarian in compiling the inventory, attempting to lend some order to the rich variety of inherited knowledge that was the imperial library collection. As such, his goal was not the striking of a manifesto on taṣnīf al-ʿulūm, but rather an inventory, the ordering of which would have been intuitively sensible to the readers he served. That sensibility, I would argue, was fully immersed in what was by then the well-established cosmological imaginary of the mature period. In this framework, the wisdom of the ancients on the secrets of the forces and sympathies that structured the cosmos blended—if somewhat fitfully—with that of the Abrahamic prophets, the Qur'an and Sunna, the Sufis, and many other learned Muslims of the distant and recent past. In what follows, each of the subcategories of works catalogued in the “occult sciences” section (taḥṣīl) by 'Atufi is explored, with an eye toward their relationship to this vision of the cosmos. The discussion largely tracks the order in which the subjects are given in that section, though subjects not contiguous in the inventory are discussed together in a few instances.

ONEIROMANCY AND PHYSIOGNOMY

The works on dream interpretation and physiognomy at the head of the section exemplify the complexities of the evolving position of the occult sciences relative to “Islamic” knowledge, including both the assimilation of pagan discourses with prophetic ones and the impact of later Sufi discourses on the understanding of occult praxes. The oneiromantic works listed by 'Atufi represent a mix of popular older Arabic and Persian works on the topic, and some that were much more recent—including a treatise by 'Atufi himself (303 {17–18}). The best-represented text is the K. Kāmil al-ta'bīr (The Complete Book of Dream Interpretation, 302 {16–19} of Husayn Hubaysh bin Ibrahim al-Tiflisi (d. 1231), six copies of which are recorded.²⁶ A classic of the genre originally composed for the Seljuq Sultan of Rum, Qilij Arslan II (r. 1173–92), it combines elements from the Qur'an and Sunna; reports from figures such as the prophet Daniel (Dāniyāl), the sixth Shi'i Imam Ja'far al-Sadiq (d. 765), and the early muḥaddith and authority on dreams Ibn Sirin (d. 728)²⁷; and numerous elements drawn from the Oneirocritica of the second-century CE pagan writer Artemidorus of Ephesus,²⁸ which was translated during the Abbasid era by the famous Hunayn bin Ishaq (d. 873). A copy of al-Dinawari's (d. after 1010) popular K. al-Qādirī fī al-ta'bīr (The Book for al-Qadir on Dream Interpretation, 303 {11}) is found here as well,²⁹ as are three copies of K. al-Mu'allam 'alā ḥurūf al-mu'jam ([The Book of Dream Interpretation] Arranged according to the Alphabet, 303 {7–9}) by Ibn Ghannam al-Hanbali al-Maqdisi (d. 1294). The latter draws on many of the same authorities as K. Kāmil al-ta'bīr, but it was innovative in having cast off the shambolic system of classifying dreams enshrined in Artemidorus in favor of an alphabetized discussion of figures and things that might appear to the dreamer, such as angels, all manner of animals and objects, the letters of the alphabet, etc. Among the more recent works in the palace library collection are two copies of a dream manual (302 {13})

by the scholar and Sufi Qutb al-Din Zada (d. 1480), a one-time student of Molla Fenari (d. 1431) and contemporary of Sultan Bayezid II and 'Atufi, who also authored important commentaries on the works of Ibn al-'Arabi and his disciple Sadr al-Din al-Qunawi (d. 1274).³⁰ 'Atufi's own contribution to the discipline is a work entitled R. Ramz al-daqa'iq fi 'ilm al-daqa'iq (The Symbol of the Intricacies regarding the Knowledge of the Intricacies, that is, Knowledge of the Veridical Bodily Dream-Vision, 303 {17–18}).

Taken together, these works represent the main dynamics of the centuries-long maturation of Muslim thought on dream interpretation as a dialogue between prophetic (biblical, Qur'anic, and hadith-based) sources and pagan ones (especially Artemidorus), with the later addition of new Sufi discourses.³¹ This dialogue was based initially on the general concordance between prophetic and pagan sources that dreams could serve as channels of communication from the divine, whether delivered directly to the dreamer by sanctified figures of the past, or as coded messages that require interpretation in order to be understood. While manuals by Muslim authors emphasized the superior nature of the former type—especially dreams in which the Prophet appeared, which were considered unimpeachable—it was the latter type that constituted the focus of 'ilm al-ta'bir. As set forth by Artemidorus and largely followed by Muslim authors, this science was explicitly analogist, deriving the meanings of oneiric phenomena on the basis of “the juxtaposition of similarities,” and thus allowing for the classification of those phenomena into different categories of prognostications in relation to different dreamers and waking situations.³² Dream interpretation thus is conceived in these manuals as of a piece with the logic of other occult disciplines of the period, and with other diagnostic discourses derived largely from Hellenistic sources, such as humoral medicine. Later mystical discourses then added a new dimension to discourses on dreaming, with theorists such as al-Suhrawardi and Ibn al-'Arabi positing concepts of a mesocosmic plane of reality in which oneiric-cum-visionary phenomena were primary. Such cosmological concepts were integral to the sorts of visionary claims to knowledge that helped constitute Sufism's religious and epistemic authority in the period.

The works on physiognomy ('ilm al-firāsa) in the palace library collection trace an arc similar to that of oneiromancy. The science is concerned with drawing conclusions about the moral and spiritual qualities of a person on the basis of observable physical characteristics.³³ It has a lengthy pre-Islamic provenance, as demonstrated by the numerous volumes listed by 'Atufi translating works attributed to Aristotle and the physician Polemon of Laodicea (d. 144),³⁴ and it was closely tied to Hellenistic and Avicennan medical-diagnostic discourses.³⁵ Sufi thought and practice later contributed new formulations of firāsa, portraying it as a form of mystical clairvoyance that enabled Sufi shaykhs to read the inner character of their disciples, and thus as something beyond mere rational induction. An important example of later Sufi contributions to the science is the treatise (304 {18}) listed in the inventory by the Sufi shaykh Muhammad Nurbakhsh (d. 1464), eponym of the Nurbakhshiyya order that was a Shi'i offshoot of the Kubrawiyya.³⁶ In addition to arguing for the reliability and religious lawfulness of physiognomy, Nurbakhsh ties the practice to Sufi discourses of refining and improving the self in the path toward union with the divine. He posits that, as Shahzad Bashir puts it, “[negative] properties associated with bodily organs,” and thus detectable through the science of physiognomy, “can be overcome through deliberate effort and the company of the religious elect.”³⁷

Musings on the body and its relationship to one's spiritual state were central to Nurbakhsh's thought. Possessed of the sort of messianic aspirations sometimes found among Sufis of the period, he theorized that bodies could in fact become vessels for numerous spirits, and claimed that his own body was host to the spirits of Jesus, the Prophet Muhammad, and the Mahdi.³⁸ It has been argued that his thinking along these lines helped pave the way for Safavid ideology.³⁹ As with the discourse on dream interpretation, we thus see that Sufi articulations of occult praxes could be of central importance to the extraordinary, often messianic claims to authority that Sufis sometimes made in this period—claims that political actors were concerned with harnessing to their own ends.

ALCHEMY AND THE SCIENCE OF STONES

Alchemy (al-kīmīyā'), another discourse with ancient roots, is first and foremost the science of the transmutation of metals, particularly non-precious metals into precious ones. It also intersected with fields such as metallurgy, minting, pharmacology, and dye making.⁴⁰ Alchemy was a topic of perennial interest at ruling courts due to its potential as a source of wealth, though it could be a source of royal anxiety as well, due to concerns about counterfeiting. At a theoretical level, it was an important site for philosophical and theological debates about the constitution of physical matter, its relationship to the divine, and the limits of man's ability to understand and manipulate nature. Writings on alchemy are commonly shrouded in pseudonymity, obscurantism, allegories, and the use of elaborate sets of symbols and code names (Decknamen) for processes, substances, and laboratory equipment. The resultant ambiguities of alchemical discourse, combined with its themes of transformation and purification, made it an irresistible ground for metaphors for writers of a mystical and esoteric bent. Allusions to alchemy in Sufi writings are common, for example, even to the extent that great Sufi masters such as Dhu al-Nun al-Misri, Sahl al-Tustari, and Jalal al-Din Rumi garnered posthumous reputations as master alchemists.⁴¹

The majority of the books catalogued by 'Atufi under the heading of alchemy contain well-known Arabic texts on the topic. Best represented are works from the large corpus of writings attributed to Jabir bin Hayyan (d. 815?), a figure remembered as having been part of the retinue of the great 'Alid Ja'far al-Sadiq (d. 765), though in historical fact they likely were authored by coterie of anonymous thinkers of the ninth and tenth centuries.⁴² These include K. Uṣṭuqus al-uss (The Book of the Elements of the Foundation, 304 {13–14}),⁴³ K. al-Jumal [al-'ishrīn] (The Book of Twenty Maxims, 305 {14}), K. al-'Ahd (The Book of the Pact, 306 {4–5}),⁴⁴ and K. al-Rahma (The Book of Mercy, 306 {6–7}).⁴⁵ A copy of K. Mawāzīn al-ahjār (The Book of the Balances of the Stones, 306 {7}) also listed here could be any one of a number of works from the corpus with similar titles.⁴⁶ Also found are texts attributed to two pre-Islamic sages regarded as primordial authorities on alchemy, Hermes (Hermus) and Zosimos (Rismus, fl. early fourth century),⁴⁷ as well as two well-known works from medieval al-Andalus: the lengthy alchemical poem Shudhūr al-dhahab (Nuggets of Gold, 306 {4}) by Ibn Arfa' Ra's (d. 1197) and the Rutbat al-ḥakīm (The Rank of the Wise, 305 {12}) of Maslama b. Qasim al-Qurtubi (d. 964).⁴⁸ Other volumes include two compilations of treatises attributed to Ibn Sina, each of which contains a treatise on alchemy,⁴⁹ and a gathering of works by the great theologian and mystic al-Ghazali (d. 1111).⁵⁰ The latter volume seems to have been included under this heading because it contains what is listed as an Arabic translation of his famous Kīmīyā'-i sa'ādat (The Alchemy of Happiness, 305 {19}).⁵¹

The works from the Jabirian corpus are largely theoretically oriented, and are deeply concerned with the occult properties of material substances and their places in the cosmic web of sympathetic relationships. Starkly divergent from discourses on cosmology and physic that emerged from early kalām and traditionalist movements, it is perhaps unsurprising that they were cultivated in esotericist sectarian circles. By 'Atufi's period, however, such ideas about the nature of matter were largely given. Something similar can be said of al-Qurtubi's Rutbat al-ḥakīm, a companion text to the same author's famous grimoire of astral magic, Ghāyat al-ḥakīm (The Goal of the Wise, known in Europe as Picatrix). Both works were composed under the strong influence of the aforementioned quasi-Neoplatonic Rasā'il Ikhwān al-ṣafā', another product of an early coterie of sectarian intellectuals that eventually helped to shape post-classical cosmological speculation.⁵² That these works significantly contributed to the Western Islamic intellectual milieu that birthed Sufi lettrists such as Ibn al-'Arabi and al-Buni no doubt contributed to the wider acceptance of such texts that once might have been considered quite outré. The presence here of treatises on alchemy attributed to Ibn Sina is something of a historical curiosity, as, at least in his early writings, he was a severe critic of the science.⁵³ It is entirely plausible, however, that a reader such as 'Atufi would have found Avicennan thought, as it had reached him through the commentarial tradition, to be thoroughly compatible conceptually with that of Jabir and the others in the collection. 'Atufi's inclusion of the al-Ghazali volume in this part of the inventory is more puzzling, as the alchemy referred to in the great theologian's popular treatise is strictly a metaphor for spiritual transformation. Like the revered Sufis mentioned above, however, al-Ghazali was often regarded as a master of the occult sciences, with various treatises on alchemy, lettrism, etc. circulating under his name. 'Atufi and other readers at the Ottoman court thus may have credited his work with genuine insights into the art of transmutation.

It must be said that the works collected here hardly seem to constitute the library of a practicing alchemist. The strongest indicator of this is the absence of works by the Mamluk alchemist 'Izz al-Din Aydamir al-Jildaki (fl. fourteenth century), whose writings were fundamental to alchemical practice in the period.⁵⁴ If the palace library collection thus suggests a readership with more of a philosophical interest in the science than a practical one, it is nonetheless remarkable for being early relative to the golden age of Ottoman alchemy, which would commence only in the later sixteenth century, thanks in large part to the writings of Ali Çelebi, known in alchemical circles as al-mu'allif al-jadid ("the new author").⁵⁵ The anonymous Turkish work Bustan al-hikma (The Garden of Wisdom, 305 {15}) listed here is thus of interest as an early example of alchemical poetry in Turkish. As Tuna Artun has noted based on surviving fragments, it likely was a commentary or synthesis of an older Arabic text, but it stands in any case as one of the earliest traces of alchemical writing in the Turkish vernacular.⁵⁶ Closely related to alchemy is the science of stones (ilm al-ahjār), a discourse centered on the occult properties of stones (khawāṣṣ al-ahjār), though also dealing with issues of pharmacology, mineralogy, mining, etc.⁵⁷ Numerous works on this science were attributed to the usual ancient authors—Aristotle, Hermes, Dioscorides, et alia—though the identifiable works catalogued here belong entirely to Muslim writers who synthesized and expanded the teachings of the ancients. These include many of the best-known Arabic and Persian works on the topic: at least one copy of Abu Rayhan al-Biruni's (d. 1050) K. al-Jamāhir fi al-jawāhir (The Comprehensive Book on Stones, 307 {3}),⁵⁸ the physician and littérateur al-Tifashi's (d. 1253) K. Azhār al-afkār fi jawāhir al-ahjār (The Blossoms of Contemplation on the Natures of Stones, 307 {1–2}), and Nasir al-Din Tusi's (d. 1274) Tansukhnāmah-i ilkhānī (Book on Precious Stones for the Ilkhan, 307 {7}),⁵⁹ Also listed here is a title given as Uyūn al-ḥaqā'iq fi ṣanā'i' al-ḥiyal al-ajība (The Sources of Truths on the Manufacture of Wondrous Devices, 307 {3–4}). This is most likely Uyūn al-ḥaqā'iq wa-iḍāh al-ṭara'iq (The Sources of Truths and the Explanations of Paths) by Abu al-Qasim al-Iraqi al-Simawī (fl. early thirteenth century), a work—discussed in greater detail below—on various "magical" operations and artificial wonders that includes a section on gems and minerals and their sympathetic relationships to the planets.⁶⁰ The science of stones was a major site for discussions of the occult properties (khawāṣṣ, sing. khaṣṣa) of things, a concept that was also an indispensable element of discourses on alchemy, astrology and astral magic, medicine, etc. That it earns a heading in 'Atufi's inventory testifies to the importance in the period of the discourse on occult properties and its analogist approach to comprehending the concrete things of the terrestrial world, as interlaced with the movements of the heavens and the hidden workings of the divine.

GEOMANCY, BIBLIOMANCY, AND JAFR

While astrology and oneiromancy were time-honored methods of prognostication across the Mediterranean and Near East, Islamic civilization gave rise to three relatively unique divinatory discourses that were popular enough by the turn of the sixteenth century to merit their own subheadings in this section of the inventory: geomancy (al-raml), omens (fa'l) based on rhapsodomantic procedures, and the complex of political-eschatological texts and lettrist divinatory practices known as jafṛ. Each claimed roots in prophetic knowledge and in the earliest period of Islam, but by the late medieval period had been elaborated as highly technical divinatory praxes fully enmeshed in the new cosmological imaginary.

The art of geomancy, which became wildly popular across Arab and Persianate milieux from the thirteenth century onward, had noteworthy advantages over astrology, which it in some ways resembles.⁶¹ Requiring almost no equipment or mathematical skills, it was highly practicable by almost anyone. Furthermore, through references to the Qur'an and certain hadiths, its Muslim practitioners could make credible-enough claims of divine/prophetic approval of the art, though the survival of an extensive Judeo-Arabic literature on the topic makes clear that its appeal was hardly limited to Muslims.⁶² Often compared to Chinese I Ching divination, the art consists of drawing sixteen series of lines (in sand or on a piece of paper) while concentrating on a query; totaling the number of lines in each series for an odd or even number; and then, according to a relatively simple set of rules, extrapolating from that data a series of figures, each consisting of four rows with either one or two dots in each row (for a total of sixteen possible figures). A typical reading produces fifteen of these figures in a set arrangement, the interpretation of which could then lead to anything from simple yes or no answers as to the advisability of a given action to intricately detailed forecasts of future events.

While the literature on geomancy often locates the genesis of the science with the prophet Idris (who learned it from the angel Jibril), and thence with figures such as the ancient Indian sage Tumtum al-Hindi and a contemporary of the Prophet Muhammad named Khalaf al-Barbari, the name most strongly associated with the late medieval flourishing of the science is an early thirteenth-century Berber by the name of Abu 'Abd Allah Muhammad al-Zanati (d. before 1230), to whom various treatises on the topic are attributed.⁶³ An extensive literature on geomancy developed across Arab and Persianate milieux in ensuing centuries, including translations and commentaries on al-Zanati, as well as numerous original works. This growing body of literature saw the sixteen geomantic figures and the fifteen "houses" in which they are arranged as having various correspondences (astrological, numerological, elemental, humoral, etc.), putting the science in dialogue with astrology, alchemy, lettrism, medicine, and other discourses. One work in 'Atufi's list is directly attributed to al-Zanati, Fathḥ al-aqfāl fī 'ilm al-ashkāl (Opening the Locks on Knowledge of the Figures, 307 {14}), a title not attested elsewhere to the best of my knowledge. In addition, the work listed here as Kitāb Ashkāl al-raml (The Geomantic Figures, 308 {3}) is perhaps a copy of Ḥulūl al-ashkāl (Explanation of the Figures), a popular Turkish translation of al-Zanati's al-Faṣl fī uṣūl al-raml (Section on the Sources of Geomancy). The rest of the works listed are anonymous. Of these, the two described as taqwīm al-raml (Geomantic Almanac) are of interest. The taqwīm is best known in Ottoman contexts as a kind of astrological almanac prepared for rulers each year by court astrologers as part of their normal duties.⁶⁴ These presumably are similar products, based on geomantic castings rather than astrological ones. At least in slightly later periods, it was not uncommon for a court astrologer to also be a geomancer (rammāl), so these anonymous almanacs may have been produced by the court astrologers of Bayezid II or an earlier sultan. Whatever the case, they suggest an "official" practice of geomancy at the Ottoman court prior to the sixteenth century, a measure of the status the science had achieved by that time.

The subheading 'Atufi gives as kutub al-fāl contains works on various types of prognostication through omens, many dealing with some form of rhapsodomancy, which is to say, divination from written texts. This was sometimes done by opening a text to a random page and then taking the first word or verse on which one's eyes lit as the basis for a prognostication, though more complex operations were often called for.⁶⁵ The first treatise mentioned deals with Qur'anic rhapsodomancy, a practice known since the Umayyad period. The work listed here (308 {12–13}) as having been set down for the Abbasid caliph Harun al-Rashid (r. 786–809) may be an original, self-contained rhapsodomantic text similar to al-Qur'a al-Mā'mūniyya (Prognosticon of al-Ma'mun) discussed by Toufic Fahd. The latter was supposedly composed for Harun's son al-Ma'mun by the famous philosopher al-Kindi (d. 873); it contained, as Fahd describes it, "in the form of tables, 144 questions, followed by 144 chapters, each comprising 12 answers." The work listed by 'Atufi as K. Dāniyāl al-nabī (The Book of the Prophet Daniel, 308 {8}) might be the widely circulated Malḥamat Dāniyāl (Destinies of Daniel), a book of astro-meteorological prediction,⁶⁶ or perhaps the work discussed by Fahd under the title Qur'at Dāniyāl (Prognosticon of Daniel), which is similar to that composed for al-Ma'mun.⁶⁷ In a related but distinct vein is the work listed in the inventory on the zā'iraja (308 {9}).⁶⁸ This was a divinatory device and method that seems to have emerged in the late medieval Islamic West, which uses complex circular tables and a combination of astrology and mathematical operations to direct the diviner to various parts of a long and thoroughly opaque poem, from which answers to the query are derived.⁶⁹ Ibn Khaldun writes on the zā'iraja at great length in al-Muqaddima. He describes it in detail, though predictably rejects the notion that it offers any insights into the world of the unseen (al-ghayb).⁷⁰ The Jām-i sukhan-gūy (Oracle Cup, 308 {9–10}), listed in two copies by 'Atufi just after the work on the zā'iraja, is apparently a similar kind of prognosticative device.⁷¹

The final category of divinatory texts 'Atufi notes is the science of jafr—a term rooted in early Shi'i reports of a special text or collection of texts (al-jafr) in the possession of the Prophet's cousin and son-in-law, 'Ali bin Abi Talib (d. 661), and his descendants. It contained various bodies of otherwise secret prophetic knowledge, such as the names of all earthly rulers until the end of time and the events that would lead to the day of reckoning.⁷² These reports of special political-eschatological knowledge in the hands of the Shi'i Imams belong to a wider body of apocalyptic literature from the early Islamic period, known as malāḥim (destinies). The genre seems to have undergone a resurgence in the late medieval period, when numerous texts of end-time predictions were produced by Muslim visionaries of various stripes.⁷³ By the latter period, the notion had arisen of a "science of jafr" (ilm al-jafr) that encompassed various methods of prognostication, particularly by means of the letters of the Arabic alphabet and their numerical and astrological properties. Analyses of the names of rulers in order to determine the nature of their reigns or the outcomes of battles were among the most prevalent techniques. Like the early sources that inspired it, this later jafr literature tended toward matters of political and eschatological prognostication, and from at least the fifteenth century forward, courtly practitioners of the science often analyzed the letters of rulers' names to cast them in roles of eschatological significance. The science was thus an important contributor to the millenarian tenor of the period. The collection of works on this genre in the palace library is small, though it contains two known titles. One is K. al-Washy al-maṣūn fī ma'rifat 'ilm al-khaṭṭ alladhī bayn al-kāf wa-al-nūn (The Book of the Hidden Ornaments of Knowledge of the Line between the Kāf and the Nūn, 309 {18–19}) by a thirteenth-century author known only as Abu al-'Abbas Ahmad bin Muhammad. It is said by Hajji Khalifa to be a large work on the science of jafr, with chapters on 623 methods pertaining to it.⁷⁴ The other is K. Ṣayḥat al-būm fī ḥawādith al-Rūm (The Book of the Cry of the Owl regarding the Events of Rome, 309 {17}), a book of apocalyptic predictions popularly attributed to Ibn al-'Arabi. It belongs securely to the category of late medieval malāḥim and ilm al-jafr literature and, though almost certainly not actually written by Ibn al-'Arabi, is reflective of Sufi millenarianism in the period. It plays a role in the apocalyptic writings of 'Abd al-Rahman al-Bistami, who may in fact have authored it, and whose writings certainly helped popularize it among Ottoman intellectuals.⁷⁵

ARTS OF "MAGIC"

Interspersed among the subsections on divinatory arts are those on various "magical" disciplines, which is to say, practices for actively causing change in the world through occult means.⁷⁶ These are grouped under five headings: talismans (al-ṭilsimāt), nīranj, sīmiyā', the adjuration of spirits ('azā'im'), and sihr, another word for magic that often, though not always, carries a negative religio-moral valence. There is a good deal of fluidity and overlap between these categories, as suggested by the multiple titles/descriptions of works dealing with two or more of them. Indeed, the lexical meanings of terms such as nīranj, sīmiyā', and sihr are unstable even among contemporaneous authors, much less across time and space. A brief survey of the contents of the works 'Atufi has assigned to each category helps illuminate these categories somewhat, or at least his understanding of them. 'Atufi makes no effort by way of mise-en-page to distinguish works on nīranj from those on talismans, perhaps because the terms are sometimes interchangeable. Ṭilsam (talisman) is a relatively straightforward signifier for a manufactured object "charged" with occult forces, often of an astral nature.

The meaning of nīranj (pl. nīranjāt or nayranjāt, from the Persian nayrang), however, is less precise. Sometimes glossed as “enchantment,” it can denote talismans or other charged objects as well as operations ranging from tricks of prestidigitation and mechanical wonders to potions and poisons, verbal spells, etc. Of the texts in this group, the best represented is K. al-Sirr al-Maktūm fī mukhāṭabāt al-nujūm (The Book of the Hidden Secret of Conversing with the Stars) by the philosopher and Ash‘ari theologian Fakhr al-Din al-Razi (d. 1209–10), six copies or fragments of which are recorded bearing various secondary titles (308 {15–18} and 309 {1–3}).⁷⁷ Al-Razi is best known for his idiosyncratic fusion of Ash‘arism and Avicennism, his monumental Qur‘an commentary, and his writings on medicine. Al-Sirr al-maktūm is a major work of Muslim theological engagement with pagan thought, particularly the talismanic arts that allegedly were cultivated by the Sabaeans of Harran, and is ultimately an attempt to reconcile Islamic concepts of prophethood and salvation with Hermetic notions of noesis.⁷⁸ It became widely popular as a theoretical and practical guide to talismanry as the art of astral magic par excellence, reaching audiences far beyond the elite readership in theological and philosophical matters for which al-Razi probably intended it. Also listed here is one of al-Razi’s main sources, the text on talismans/nayranjāt attributed to Hermes Trismegistus (Hermus) by way of Apollonius of Tyana (Balinās): K. Hurmus alladhī tarjamahū Balīnās min qibal al-nayranjāt (The Book of Hermes Translated by Apollonius, regarding Nayranjat, 308 {19}). Another work on talismans drawing heavily on Hellenistic precedents is Dhakhūrat al-Iskandar (The Treasure of Alexander, 309 {5}), which purports to be a treatise written by Aristotle for Alexander the Great. Ullmann notes that a copy held in Paris contains numerous illustrations of images to be inscribed on talismans intended to treat various ailments, such as one to remedy sciatica, which includes the image of a naked queen being swallowed up to her hips by the mouth of a fish.⁷⁹ As for the two entries marked K. al-Shāmil (The Comprehensive, 308 {14} and 309 {1}), these are most likely copies of al-Shāmil fī baḥr al-kāmil (The Comprehensive Book of Perfect Knowledge) by Abu Fadl Muhammad al-Tabasi (d. 1089).⁸⁰ This is a large grimoire that deals extensively with astral talismans as well as numerous other types of operations, ranging from “Solomonic” techniques for summoning jinn and demons (‘azā’im, see below) to love spells and curses. Ullmann notes that Kitāb al-Shāmil is unusual for the genre in that it makes little mention of the Hellenistic authorities whom al-Razi and many others cite, but instead adduces only the prophets and saints of Islamic/Abrahamic tradition. For all this apparent piety, it includes such transgressive procedures as direct calls to Iblis (Satan) to curse one’s enemies.⁸¹ Also worthy of note is K. Tuhfat al-gharā’ib (The Book of the Precious Gift of Prodigies, 309 {3–4}), which according to ‘Atufi addresses nīranj and wonders (‘ajā’ib).⁸² Largely concerned with fantastical geography, it is best known as one of the major sources for the famous cosmographical work ‘Ajā’ib al-makhlūqāt wa-gharā’ib al-mawjūdāt (The Wonders of Creation and Prodigies of Existence) by Abu Yahya Zakariyya al-Qazwini (d. 1283),⁸³ though its inclusion under this heading suggests that it also contains some practical magical material.

‘Atufi lists three volumes (containing a total of four texts) under the subheading of sīmīyā, a term that, like nīranj, is quite flexible in its meaning, and indeed can denote much the same range of occult operations as nīranj. The word is from the Greek semeia, by way of Syriac, and some premodern authorities—Ibn Khaldun being the best-known example—associate it especially with letter magic and the Sufi science of letters. However, this limited sense of the term is not borne out by other sources, such as those recorded by ‘Atufi in this subsection.⁸⁴ Three of the four texts ‘Atufi lists are closely interrelated: the K. al-Nawāmīs (The Book of Sacred Secrets, 309 {7}) of (pseudo-)Plato, the ‘Uyūn al-ḥaqā’iq wa-idāh al-ṭarā’iq (The Sources of Truths and the Explanations of Paths, 307 {3–4} and 309 {8}) of Abu al-Qasim al-Iraqi al-Simawi (d. ca. 1260), and an abridgement (mukhtaṣar) of the latter (309 {9}). The first, which is well attested in Arabic sources but now survives as an independent work only in a Latin version (Liber Vaccae), details, as Liana Saif puts it, “experiments which involve the gruesome slaughter and mutilation of a cow to magically produce a rational animal or bees... [and] other recipes or experiments for causing extraordinary transformations, such as splitting the moon in half and causing the appearance of incredible giants.”⁸⁵ The second work, by al-Simawi (i.e., one who does sīmiyā'), is derived in part from K. al-Nawāmīs and probably includes extensive excerpts from it. However, it also contains a range of other materials, such as invisibility spells, fire spells, tricks for avoiding hunger and fatigue, mind-reading techniques, various potions, and information on the occult properties of minerals, plants, and animals. Because many of the operations proceed wholly through the manipulation of material and organic substances, modern scholars have sometimes glossed sīmiyā'—and nīranj, for that matter—as “natural” or “white magic,” as opposed to demonic or “black” magic. However, as Saif argues, this ignores the fact that works such as Uyūn al-ḥaqā'iq also include procedures involving supplications to spirits and other supernatural beings, implying that authors like al-Simawi seem not to have been concerned with these distinctions.⁸⁶ The natural/demonic magic distinction arises quite specifically out of Christian-European discourses in any case, and, in the opinion of the present author, causes more problems than it solves when ported to Islamic contexts.

The next category is works of 'azā'im, which deals with the adjuration of jinn or other spirits. This can be exorcism, i.e., driving spirits out of a possessed person, or the evocation of spirits to cause them to do one's bidding. Notions of jinn adjuration have a lengthy history in Islamicate thought, deriving from both Bedouin and Hellenistic precedents.⁸⁷ Writing in the tenth century, the Baghdadi bookseller Ibn al-Nadīm delineates licit and illicit strains of the practice, and links it to the story of Solomon imprisoning a legion of jinn in the vessel of brass.⁸⁸ Much of the aforementioned Kitāb al-Shāmil is concerned with these arts, as are parts of many of the other works discussed previously, again demonstrating the fluidity of these categories. 'Atufi mentions three other titles in the section of works on 'azā'im. The Sirr al-asrār listed here may be the well-known pseudo-Aristotelian work by that title, though it seems odd to list this work under the heading of 'azā'im. The Sifr al-asrār fī 'ajā'ib al-umūr wa-al-'azā'im (The Secret Scroll on Wondrous Matters and Adjuration [of spirits], 309 {11}) and Risāla fī da'awāt al-ra's wa-l-dhanab (Treatise on Invocations of the Head and Tail, 309 {12–13}) cannot be identified at this time. The title of the latter suggests that it contained invocations of the lunar nodes (the head and tail of the dragon), perhaps in the style of Ghayāt al-ḥakīm (The Goal of the Wise), which to some extent personifies the astral emanations (rūḥāniyyāt) as spirit-beings.⁸⁹

The final category of magical arts, siḥr (magic, sorcery), is at first glance the most eyebrow raising, as this term frequently connotes categorically illicit magical practices in the hadith literature and in classical theological and legal discourses. Nonetheless, siḥr is sometimes used without disapprobation, as in the Rasā'il ikhwān al-ṣafā', for example, where it is represented as the ultimate science of the secrets of nature.⁹⁰ The relevance of any of those considerations to 'Atufi is highly questionable, however, as the works he lists here are mostly concerned with the procedure known as al-ghālib wa-al-maghlūb (the victor and the vanquished). This is a complicated method for divining the outcomes of battles based on the numerical values of the names of the rulers involved, and could be seen as a branch of the science of jafr. The K. fī ma'rifat al-ghālib wa-al-maghlūb min al-mutaḥāribayn (The Book on Knowledge of the Victor and the Vanquished among the Combatants, 311 {1–2} and 311 {4}) listed here in three places is a known work on the topic.⁹¹ The method also finds detailed treatments in the pseudo-Aristotelian Sirr al-asrār (Secret of Secrets, probably 309 {11}),⁹² the Rāḥat al-ṣudūr (Repose of Hearts, 185 {19}) of the Seljuq historian Muhammad bin 'Ali al-Rawandī (d. early thirteenth century),⁹³ and other sources.⁹⁴ Another title listed here, R. Jihād al-mulūk 'alā ṭarīqat aḥkām al-nujūm (The Treatise on the Holy War of Kings by Way of Astrology, 311 {6–7}) would seem to confirm the martial-divinatory nature of the works gathered in this subsection. It is clear why this sort of divination would have been of great interest at the Ottoman imperial court, but it is a mystery (at least to the present author) as to why works on this topic should predominate under the heading of siḥr.

WONDROUS AUTOMATA AND WONDROUS MATTERS

Two final categories rounding out this section of the inventory contain works on “wondrous mechanical arts” and related “devices” (ṣinā'āt al-'ajība, al-ḥiyāl), as well as on “wondrous matters” (al-umūr al-‘ajība). The former two appear after the section on jafr and before the one on sihr. The third is the last category in the section; as noted above, its heading is not mentioned in the inventory’s table of contents but rather as a marginal note.

The category of “wondrous mechanical arts and tricks” is largely concerned with automata, i.e., human-made objects that move or otherwise perform without visible outside action.⁹⁵ Such objects were important luxury goods at Islamicate courts. Mechanical clocks, often decorated with elaborate figures and vignettes and installed in public spaces, were a particularly important subcategory. More prosaic mechanical devices for use in agriculture, medicine, and industry can also fall under this heading. The best-known work regarding automata is the often lavishly illustrated al-Jāmi‘ bayn al-‘ilm wa-al-‘amal al-nāfi‘ fī šinā‘at al-ḥiyāl (Comprehensive Book of Knowledge and Beneficial Practice in the Manufacture of Devices) by Isma‘il bin Razzaz al-Jazari (fl. twelfth century),⁹⁶ two copies of which are included in ‘Atufi’s inventory (310 {11–12} and 201 {16}). These mechanical arts had a much older background, of course, and Hellenistic works make up the bulk of the inventory’s entries. K. Ayrān fī ḥiyāl raf‘ al-ashyā’ al-thaqīlah (The Book of Hero on Devices for Raising Heavy Things, 310 {4}) is by the mathematician and engineer Hero of Alexandria (d. ca. 70 CE).⁹⁷ Two copies of a work by Pappus on moving heavy objects and other mechanical feats are mentioned as well, Madkhal Babūs fī al-ḥiyāl ka-jarr al-athqāl (Pappus’s Introduction on Mechanical Devices for Lifting Weights, 310 {5}),⁹⁸ as are various treatises by Philo of Byzantium on perpetual motion machines and an automated weapon, R. al-Dawā‘ir al-mutaḥarrika min dhawātihā (On Wheels that Move by Themselves, 310 {8}) and R. ‘Amal al-sā‘āt allatī tarmī bi-al-banādiq (The Treatise on the Working of a [Water-]Clock that Throws Slingstones, 310 {8–9}).⁹⁹ Also listed is a copy of the three treatises of Muristus (possibly Ctesibius of Alexandria, fl. third century BCE) on air-powered musical instruments (310 {16}).¹⁰⁰

It may strike the modern reader as odd that these works on the construction of mechanical devices—an art typically conceived of as a branch of applied mathematics in the taṣnīf al-‘ulūm literature—are included by ‘Atufi alongside texts on matters we would tend to categorize as “supernatural.” It must be understood, however, that though these mechanical arts seem from our perspective to be of a fundamentally different nature than the others in this section, all the sciences included here share some crucially important characteristics from the “emic” point of view. They are all thaumatopetic, as one early modern European thinker put it,¹⁰¹ which is to say, productive of wonder in those who consider or witness them. This was the proper emotional reaction to “interruptions of the customary” (ikhtirāq al-‘āda), that is, of the ordinary order of manifest reality. They are also all concerned with the intricate “inner” workings of things in relation to the “outer” world of everyday experience, whether the gears of an ornate mechanical clock whose statuettes move as if alive, the talisman in which subtle astral forces are invested through images and suffumigations in order to concretely influence worldly events, the complex recipes and subtle material transformations of alchemical operations meant to produce the most tangible of precious metals, or the symbol-cloaked language of dreams that reveals the secrets of waking life. Finally, these arts, though difficult to attain, are susceptible to human mastery through some combination of study and sanctity. In being mastered they are, as al-Bistami would have it, propaedeutic to a true understanding of the hidden principles that structure the whole of God’s creation.

As for the texts gathered under the heading of “wondrous matters,” they are a small and motley bunch. The marginal addition of the heading suggests that ‘Atufi inserted them late in the process of writing the inventory. There is a work on the various sects (madhāhib) of Christians, which perhaps is included here for lack of a better place: K. al-Mu‘lam fī bayān madhāhib al-naṣārā (The Book of the Informed on Explicating the Schools of Christians, 311 {12}). There is also a copy of K. al-Mukhtār fī kashf al-asrār wa-hatḥ al-astār (The Book of Selection in the Unveiling of the Secrets and the Rending of the Veils, 310 {16}) by ‘Abd al-Rahim (or al-Rahman) al-Jawbari (fl. thirteenth century), an exposé of the deceptive methods of all manner of unscrupulous tricksters, from fraudulent jewelers to sham alchemists and pretenders to sainthood.¹⁰² Himself a Sufi and alchemist, al-Jawbari’s determination to expose swindlers and debunk false claims to the extraordinary and miraculous is driven not by occultophobia, but rather by a wish to protect the integrity of God's saints and of true practitioners of the occult sciences. The work's inclusion here suggests that skepticism regarding these matters was not entirely unknown at the Ottoman court.

Finally, there are two codices with translations of a work by Yamistus "the pagan" (al-wathanī) on idol worship and the various sects associated with it. This author is George Gemistus Plethon (d. 1450, 1452, or 1454), an idiosyncratic Neoplatonic philosopher of the late Byzantine period who has aroused a good deal of interest in modern scholarship for his alleged crypto-paganism, his possibly having been influenced by al-Suhrawardi, and his significant impact on Renaissance humanism.¹⁰³ As discussed by Maria Mavroudi, the work described in the inventory as Tarjamat al-bāqīyya min kitāb Yamistūs al-wathanī (A Translation of the Remains of the Book of Yamistus the Pagan, 311 {12–13}) is an Arabic translation, likely commissioned during the reign of Sultan Mehmed II, of what is said to be a portion of one of his books that was pulled from the fire during a church-decreed public immolation of his works in Constantinople/Istanbul sometime between 1454 and 1462.¹⁰⁴ It contains excerpts from three of his works, including his rendering of the Chaldean Oracles—attributed by him to Zoroaster—that deeply influenced Marsilio Ficino and helped inject a powerful strain of occultophilism and Suhrawardi-esque "Platonic Orientalism" into Renaissance humanism. As Mavroudi argues, though some Ottoman intellectuals were hostile to Plethon's pagan inclinations—including the translator of the volume in question, who writes a scathing introduction to it—others perceived the theurgic nature of his writings to be concordant with Suhrawardian thought and various Neoplatonic strands of Muslim philosophy.¹⁰⁵ This is to say that his writings were quite at home within the new cosmological imaginary of the period.

NOTES

1. Fāl is given throughout the inventory. Fa'l is a common variant.
2. This is vocalized as nayranj in the manuscript, which would seem to be a hybrid of the Arabic nīranj and its Persian source-word, nayrang. See Elz, s.v. "Nīrandj," by Toufic Fahd.

3. Nīranj and sīmiyā' are terms that evade straightforward translation. They are both often rendered as "natural magic" or "white magic"; however, neither gloss stands up to close scrutiny, as discussed below.

Six volumes (renamed in the Mamluk sultan's honor as Al-Zāhirī fī al-'ibar bi-akhbār al-'arab wa-al-'ajam wa-al-barbar) are catalogued as TSMK 2924/3–6 and 13–14. 76. As it has been used in modern scholarship, the term “magic” is fraught with problems. It has been made to serve as a foil to both “religion” and “science,” and to perform all manner of racist, misogynist, heteronormative, and colonial labor in the process. For a detailed discussion of these issues, see Randall Styers, Making Magic: Religion, Magic, and Science in the Modern World (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004). The word is nevertheless inescapable, and it has been used often in scholarship on Islamicate thought. For some general discussions of the topic—the earlier of which tend most to exemplify the aforementioned problems—see Edmond Doutté, Magie et religion dans l’Afrique du Nord (Paris: La société musulmane du Maghrib, 1984); Toufic Fahd, “Le monde du sorcier En Islam,” in Le monde du sorcier (Paris: Editions du Seuil, 1966), 155–204; El2, s.v. “Siḥr,” by Toufic Fahd; Ullmann, Die Natur- und Geheimpwissenschaften, 359–426; Savage-Smith, “Introduction” (to her Magic and Divination in Early Islam); Coulon, La magie en terre d’Islam.

84. On the word’s derivation, see El2, s.v. “Sīmiyā,” by D. B. MacDonald and Toufic Fahd. For Ibn Khaldūn’s rather tendentious linking of the term to lettrism, see Ibn Khaldūn, The Muqaddimah, 3:171; Gardiner, Ibn Khaldūn versus the Occultists. In the opinion of the present author, the “semitic” element of the term likely originates in the use of cipher alphabets, mysterious charaktères, etc. in various areas of magical practice. LIST OF ENTRIES

SECTION ON BOOKS OF OCCULT SCIENCES:

The Science of Dream Interpretation or Oneiromancy, the Science of Physiognomy, the Science of Alchemy, the Science of Stones, Geomancy, Omens, the Science of Nayranjāt, Talismans, Sīmiyā, the Adjuration of Spirits, the Science of Jafr, Wondrous Mechanical Arts/Automata, Engineering Feats, and Sorcery

(Tafṣīlu kutubi ‘ilmi al-ta’bīri wa-kutubi ‘ilmi al-firāsati wa-kutubi al-‘ilmi al-kīmiyā’i wa-kutubi ‘ilmi al-aḥjāri wa-kutubi al-ramli wa-kutubi al-fāli wa-kutubi ‘ilmi al-nayrinjāti wa-kutubi al-ṭilsimāti wa-kutubi al-sīmiyā’i wa-kutubi al-‘azā’imi wa-kutubi ‘ilmi al-jafri wa-kutubi al-ṣinā’āti al-‘ajibati wa-kutubi al-ḥiyali wa-kutubi al-siḥri)

Because the study of the Islamic occult sciences is a yet underdeveloped field, and because knowledge of the conditions under which manuscripts on these subjects circulated is invaluable to ongoing efforts to improve this state of affairs, the list of entries has been prepared so as to preserve a sense of the individual codices, variant titles, etc. The original order of the titles in the inventory is thus reproduced here, and the names of authors and “authority” titles for works are given only after noting the title given in the inventory (along with the language of composition and line number). For codices containing more than one work, the titles are given in an indented list numbered a through x. A complete list of authors keyed to the entry numbers is given at the end. N.B. Pseudepigraphy is not uncommon in the realm of the occult sciences, and no claims are being made here as to the authenticity of these attributions. Anonymous titles from the inventory are given in quotation marks. Translated titles are given in lowercase (following the first word) when the original appears to be a description rather than a title proper.

A note on translation: The words nīranj (pl. nayranjāt, sometimes nīranjāt or nayrinjāt), sīmiyā, and jafr are left untranslated. Nīranj is variously translated elsewhere as “tricks,” “illusions,” “spells,” or “enchantments”; sīmiyā is often translated as “natural magic” or “letter magic”; and jafr is sometimes rendered as “onomancy” (i.e., divination from names). However, it is the present author’s considered opinion that such translations are in some cases simply inaccurate (e.g., “natural magic”) and in others too limiting, given the fluidity of meaning with which premodern authors strategically imbued them in light of controversies about occultism.

Abbreviations: El2 = Encyclopaedia of Islam, Second Edition, ed. P. J. Bearman, Th. Bianquis, C. E. Bosworth, E. van Donzel, and W. P. Heinrichs (Leiden: E. J. BOOKS ON ASTROLOGY, ASTRONOMICAL TABLES, AND ALMANACS IN THE LIBRARY INVENTORY OF BAYEZID II

Paratextual elements in manuscripts often offer surprising clues as to the different stages of transmission a particular copy has undergone. Take, for instance, the Süleymaniye Library Ayasofya Collection MS 2595, a thirteenth-century Persian translation of a popular medieval illustrated star catalogue, Kitāb şuwar al-kawākib (The Book of Constellations of Fixed Stars), produced originally in Arabic in the tenth century by ‘Abd al-Rahman al-Sufi (d. 986).¹ Several marks on the title page and colophon of the manuscript reveal information about its date of composition as well as the subsequent chain of owners/readers during its circulation in the next few centuries.

The colophon on folio 97b states that the famous polymath and founder of the Maragha observatory, Nasir al-Din al-Tusi (d. 1274), completed this Persian translation on Monday, 25 Dhu’l-Qa‘da 647 (March 1, 1250). Next to this colophon is a statement written horizontally in another hand, indicating that the book had been penned by Tusi himself and was later acquired in Baghdad in the year 805 (1402–3) by the Jalayirid ruler Ahmad b. Shaykh Uways (d. 1410). There are yet other possession statements on the title page (fol. 1a): what seems to be the earliest one, li-ahwaj khalq Allāh Ulugh Bīg (for the most needy of created beings, Ulugh Beg), refers to Ulugh Beg (d. 1449), the famous Timurid ruler and founder of the Samarqand observatory. Above this note is the endowment (waqf) statement and seal of the Ottoman sultan, Mahmud I (r. 1730–54). At the bottom of the same page is the impression of yet another stamp, the idiosyncratic almond-shaped seal of Bayezid II (r. 1481–1512). The same seal is also stamped on the colophon page, documenting without any doubt that the manuscript was in the Ottoman imperial treasury by the turn of the sixteenth century.

In addition to the colophon and possession statements, two different versions of the book title are recorded on the title page of the manuscript. The short one just above the seal of Mahmud I reads: Kitāb şuwar al-kawākib tarjama-i Khwāja Naşir (The Book of Constellations of Fixed Stars, Translated by Master al-Nasir [al-Tusi]). The second, longer title is inscribed at the top of the page in the hand that apparently penned the titles of many other surviving manuscripts bearing Bayezid II’s oval seal. This title reads: Kitāb tarjama kitāb şuwar al-kawākib bi-al-fārsiyya marqūm bi-annah bi-khaṭṭ mutarjimihi alladhī huwa al-Naşir al-Ṭūsī min qibal al-nujūm (The [Persian] Translation of the Book of Constellations of Fixed Stars, Marked as the Autograph Copy of Its Translator, al-Nasir al-Tusi, Pertaining to [the Science of] the Stars). This longer version of the title is repeated verbatim in ‘Atufi’s inventory (see list of entries [126]/[158]) dated 908 (1502–3), a clean copy of which was produced the following year in 909 (1503–4).²

The documented circulation of this particular manuscript—first from the Ilkhanids to the Jalayirids, then from the Jalayirids to the Timurids, and finally from the Timurids to the Ottomans—embodies the otherwise relatively abstract notion of the transmission of scientific knowledge and ideas. The curious stories offered by such surviving copies stimulate the historian’s imagination with the detailed logs of the movement of manuscripts across wide territories. That books were presented as personal or diplomatic gifts, or that valuable objects, including manuscripts, were at times of military encounter seized by the conquering party, can explain how written materials were transmitted from one courtly context to another. The physical transition of manuscripts may also be correlated with the simultaneous movement of scholars accompanied by their retinues who carried their possessions between distant locations. In the particular case of Tusi's Persian translation of the star catalogue, which later passed into the hands of Ulugh Beg, the recounted arrival of the astronomer 'Ali al-Qushji (d. 1474) to Istanbul around 1472, with nearly two hundred people in his entourage, may provide a compelling explanation for the eventual journey of this copy—along with many other relevant items listed in 'Atufi's inventory—from the Timurid to the Ottoman realm.³ Undoubtedly, the coming of al-Qushji to Istanbul was not the only occasion for the accumulation of works on different branches and genres of celestial knowledge in the Ottoman capital. But regardless of how each item ended up in the Ottoman palace, the relevant holdings of the palace library as documented in 'Atufi's inventory neatly reflect the strong influence of post-thirteenth-century astral lore from the Persianate East, specifically of works descending from the Maragha and Samarqand "schools," on the formation and collection of a noteworthy astral canon in late fifteenth- to early sixteenth-century Istanbul.⁴ The primary aim of the present article is to discuss the general contours of this influence based on the relevant catalogue section in 'Atufi's inventory that lists books on astrological and other practical celestial pursuits, which he groups under the following rubrics: 'ilm al-nujūm (science of the stars), min qibal al-nujūm (pertaining to the stars), or aḥkām al-nujūm (decrees of the stars, i.e., astrology sensu stricto).

In order to avoid potential confusion, we should note at the outset that the modern distinction between astrology and astronomy does not fully correspond to the disciplinary boundaries that existed in the medieval and early modern scientific culture of the Islamicate world, or elsewhere. The boundaries between 'ilm al-hay'a (namely, the science of the structure or configuration [of the entire universe], i.e., astronomy) and 'ilm (or ṣinā'at) aḥkām al-nujūm (namely, the science or art of the decrees of the stars, i.e., astrology), which emerged and consolidated as early as the ninth century according to George Saliba, were not always categorically followed in late medieval and early modern astral lore in the Persianate East. This was especially the case for works that deal primarily with the practical application of celestial knowledge.⁵

As a general rule, the relevant works in the astral lore of the post-thirteenth-century Persianate East also implied a distinction between hay'a and nujūm. Whereas the former term ('ilm al-hay'a) was employed to describe theoretical celestial knowledge that "sought a coherent physical cosmography based on mathematical models," the category 'ilm al-nujūm was used more as a blanket term, encompassing different branches and genres that dealt with the practical implications of celestial knowledge, including astrology.⁶ Works that modern historiography facetiously groups together as "astronomical texts," such as *zīj*es (handbooks of tables used for astronomical, astrological, and calendrical purposes) or treatises on instruments like astrolabes, conveyed information necessary for astrological calculations.⁷ Indeed, astrological practice, which depended in principle on drawing inferences (aḥkām) from celestial degrees and configurations in a given moment at a particular locality, would not have been possible without the astronomical data and parameters of calculation offered by these texts. Authoritative ancient and medieval sources such as Ptolemy (d. ca. 170), Biruni (d. ca. 1050), and Tusi are all explicit on this point, declaring that a precise mathematical knowledge of celestial positions was what the munajjims (astrologers/astronomers) needed to practice their craft, particularly for casting horoscopes and preparing almanacs with prognostications (taqwīms).⁸ The urge in the post-thirteenth-century Persianate East to establish observatories and conduct systematic celestial observations was also intimately related to improving the precision of celestial data and parameters, which the astral experts needed for their calculations.⁹

A more detailed discussion of 'Atufi's terminology and treatment of available titles in the library will follow in the pages to come. But suffice it to say now that compared to the number of titles strictly related to the theoretical genre of 'ilm al-hay'a (which is around 130 by our count), the inventory contains a greater number of works (about 200) in the abovementioned genres, which can be defined, for the sake of simplicity, as astrology and practical astronomical endeavors (['ilm] al-nujūm, min qibal al-nujūm, ['ilm] aḥkām al-nujūm).¹⁰ In our examination of the listed items on astrological and/or practical celestial pursuits in the imperial library, we will supplement 'Atufi's inventory with concrete evidence from relevant contemporaneous texts and tables, particularly those produced during the reign of Bayezid II, whose genuine astral interests were noted in a wide array of contemporary sources. We will also examine the systematic set of annual almanacs routinely composed by practicing Ottoman munajjims, and track the scholarly references therein to assess more accurately the extent to which the library collection reflects the trends of contemporary astral practitioners. We will also draw on these late fifteenth- and early sixteenth-century taqwīms, some of which have the almond-shaped seal of Bayezid II but curiously are not listed in the inventory, for further speculation on the inner workings of the imperial library, as well as to assess the logic deployed by 'Atufi in preparing his inventory. Finally, we will focus on 'Atufi's categorization of titles pertaining to different branches and genres of celestial knowledge, and point to its remarkable deviation from other, more canonical classification systems adopted in the early modern Ottoman intellectual setting by relatively better-known, later figures like Taşköprizade Ahmed (d. 1561), Nev'i Efendi (d. 1599), and Katib Çelebi (d. 1657).

CELESTIAL PURSUITS AT THE OTTOMAN COURT, 1470S TO 1510S

At the time al-Qushji arrived in Istanbul, systematic scholarly activity on celestial knowledge was only in its infancy in the Ottoman realm.¹¹ As a matter of fact, several treatises of Tusi were already in circulation in the lands of Rūm during the fourteenth and first half of the fifteenth century, such as his introductory textbook on the astrological indications of planets, zodiac signs, and planetary aspects titled Sī faṣl or Mukhtaṣar dar ma'rifat-i taqwīm (Thirty Chapters on Almanacs), his Zīj-i ilkhānī (Ilkhanid Astronomical Handbook of Tables), and his al-Tadhkira fī 'ilm al-hay'a (Memoir on Astronomy).¹² The Fenari circle in western Anatolia, including such members as the prominent scholar Molla Fenari (d. 1431) and the Khurasan-born 'Abdulwajid b. Muhammad (d. 1435), was also well informed about the scientific output of the Maragha school.¹³ indicates that Ottoman territory was not the ideal place for a would-be expert to excel in the science of the stars at the time. For instance, Qadizade al-Rumi (d. after 1440), one of the intellectual founders of the Samarqand observatory, grew up in Bursa and received his first education within the Fenari circle. But his master Mehmed-Shah Fenari (d. 1436), the son of Molla Fenari, still felt compelled to suggest that his brilliant student should travel to Iran and Central Asia to further his quest in astral lore.¹⁴ In a similar vein, a certain 'Abdurrahman Munajjim (d. after 1510), who served at the princely court of Bayezid II's son Şehzade Ahmed (d. 1513) in Amasya no later than the early 1490s, writes in an autobiographical passage that after studying the basics of the science of the stars ('ilm al-nujūm) with Mevlana Kuçek al-Amasi (d. after 1481)—also known as Mevlana Yazdanbakhsh, the only documented court munajjim in the final years of Mehmed II's reign (r. 1444–46, 1451–81)—Şehzade Ahmed recommended that he go to the lands of Iran (diyār al-'Ajam) to advance his knowledge in the discipline.¹⁵ Besides hinting at the embryonic state of systematic astral production in the Ottoman territories throughout the fifteenth century, these details clearly suggest that in the eyes of the fifteenth-century stargazers active in the Ottoman lands, the Persianate East was the main point of reference and locus for gaining proficiency in the science of the stars.

Yet anecdotal and archival evidence about the students of celestial knowledge in the fifteenth century

The exact historical details of 'Ali al-Qushji's arrival in Istanbul are still obscure, though anecdotal evidence extracted from various near-contemporary sources clearly shows that Mehmed II went to great lengths to bring him to the Ottoman capital. The former Aqqoyunlu scholar who joined Bayezid II's court, Idris-i Bidlisi (d. 1520), even says that Mehmed II promised to enable al-Qushji to continue his unfinished observation program in Istanbul.¹⁶ Mehmed II's genuine interest in recruiting al-Qushji seems to have been related to the political prestige and instrumentality accorded to the patronage of the science of the stars in late medieval and early modern courtly culture.¹⁷ Yet the sultan's urgent need to lure an astral expert of the caliber of al-Qushji, and the authority granted him to reorganize the entire Ottoman scholarly hierarchy, could be interpreted as another sign of the inadequacy of systematized celestial pursuits in the Ottoman empire during the last third of the fifteenth century.¹⁸

‘Ali al-Qushji could only serve the Ottoman polity for two years before he passed away in 1474, followed by the death of his patron Mehmed II in 1481. Celestial pursuits and systematic attempts to cultivate the science of the stars at the Ottoman court, however, did not come to a halt. Bayezid II, who has often been derided in modern historiography for allegedly hampering the intellectual and scientific achievements attained—or at least initiated—during the reign of his “enlightened” father, was in fact an even more avid patron and eager student of the science of the stars. As we have demonstrated in greater detail elsewhere, from his gubernatorial years in Amasya to his relatively long sultanate in Istanbul, Bayezid II actively sought expertise in this science, put a sizeable group of munajjims on the palace payroll, commissioned a number of treatises on different aspects of astral knowledge, and even spent his own spare time studying the science.¹⁹ The broad celestial and (occult) philosophical interests of Bayezid II were so widely acknowledged during his lifetime that one of his contemporaries, an anonymous Sufi shaykh, privately complained in a letter apparently addressed to Bayezid II about the “worthless” efforts of the sultan to study these sciences in a formal fashion.²⁰

What the anonymous shaykh alludes to in his letter may be related to Bayezid II’s decision in the 1490s to call upon Mahmud b. Muhammed b. Qadizade al-Rumi, better known as Mirim Çelebi (d. 1525), to tutor him in the “mathematical sciences” (i.e., al-‘ulūm al-riyādiyya), which conventionally comprised astral sciences (hay’a and nujūm), along with geometry (handasa), arithmetic (hisāb), and music (mūsīqī).²¹ Descending from a family that included such stellar figures as Qadizade al-Rumi and ‘Ali al-Qushji, the young Mirim Çelebi was a direct heir to the post-thirteenth-century astral tradition of the Persianate East in addition to being learned in the Hellenistic astrological heritage. Beyond Mirim Çelebi’s service as the sultan’s private tutor, Bayezid II also asked him to compose a commentary on the Ulugh Beg tables (Zīj-i Ulugh Beg) that was produced in the Samarkand observatory through the concerted efforts of its members, including Ghiyath al-Din Jamshid al-Kashi (d. 1429), Qadizade al-Rumi, and ‘Ali al-Qushji. Completed in the year 1499, Mirim’s commentary was later catalogued in ‘Atufi’s inventory (list of entries [74]/[185]).²² As indicated by the specific supplication (sal-lamahu) used in the relevant entry, Sharḥ-i Zīj-i Ulugh Beg li-Mawlānā Mirim Çelebi sallamahu Allāhu ta’ālā fī al-nujūm (Commentary on Ulugh Beg’s Astronomical Handbook of Tables by our master Mirim Çelebi, God keep him safe), which is repeated verbatim on the title page of the surviving autograph copy of the text (SK, Ayasofya MS 2697), ‘Atufi must have known Mirim Çelebi personally.²³ While ‘Atufi is reported by Taşköprizade to have studied the rational sciences at the feet of Mirim Çelebi’s apparently elder brother, Qutb al-Din Muhammed b. Muhammed b. Qadizade al-Rumi (fl. second half of the fifteenth century), Mirim and ‘Atufi studied together ‘ilm al-uşūl (the science of principles [of jurisprudence]) under Hocazade (Khajazada) Muslih al-Din (d. 1487–88).²⁴

It is difficult to determine with certainty how long Mirim Çelebi tutored the sultan and which books featured in these studies. As far as the surviving archival documents and contemporary narrative sources are concerned, Mirim Çelebi remained in the close circle of Bayezid II until the sultan’s death.²⁵ One indication of the books Bayezid II likely studied with Mirim Çelebi is a list of surviving manuscripts in which are found special inscriptions that, in addition to the standard almond-shaped seal, suggest the book was personally owned by the sultan: ṣāhibuhu al-Sultān Bāyezīd b. Meḥmed Khān (“its owner is Sultan Bayezid”), or sometimes min kutub al-Sultān Bāyezīd b. Meḥmed Khān (“from among the books of Sultan Bayezid”).

What should we understand from these supplementary inscriptions that register such items as the personal property of the sultan? In what respects was a book with the almond-shaped seal different from a copy with both the seal and ex-libris inscription? Was there any clearly defined distinction between the books kept in the imperial treasury and the personal collection of the sultan, in terms of the space in which they were preserved, their accessibility, and their use? What percentage of the personal items Bayezid once held as a prince were transferred to the palace library and processed accordingly, and which works that were already located in the palace book treasury became reserved for the private use of the sultan?

It is difficult to provide substantial answers to these questions, as paratextual components in the surviving manuscripts fall short of presenting conclusive evidence. It is striking, though, that many of the cited works in astral lore, both theoretical and practical, constitute the great majority of surviving manuscripts that bear an attestation of Bayezid's personal ownership. Among those books bearing ṣāhibuhu statements that Bayezid likely studied, we should note the following:

- i. Nasir al-Din al-Tusi's Sī faṣṭ;²⁶
- ii. (Tusi's) Zīj-i ilkhānī;²⁷
- iii. (Tusi's) Tahrīr al-Majisī (Recension of Ptolemy's Almagest);²⁸
- iv. (Tusi's) Tadhkira fi 'ilm al-hay'a;²⁹
- v. Mukhtaṣar madkhal ilā 'ilm aḥkām al-nujūm (The Epitome of the Introduction to Astrology), 'Ali b. Ahmad Balkhī's (fl. twelfth century) astrological introduction in both the Arabic original and a Persian rendition;³⁰
- vi. The Epistle of Ikhwan al-Safa on mathematical sciences including the science of the stars;³¹
- vii. Anonymous Risāla al-lubāb fi al-uṣṭurlāb (The Quintessence on the Astrolabe);³²
- viii. al-Dirini's (d. 1297) Kitāb yawāqūt al-mawāqūt min qibal al-nujūm (Rubies of Timekeeping, an introductory work in verse on the astronomical/astrological calculation of time);³³
- ix. Abu al-Hasan 'Ali Marrakushi's (fl. late thirteenth century) summa on astronomical instrumentation and computation of time, Jāmi' al-mabādī wa-al-ghāyāt fi 'ilm al-miqāt (Comprehensive Collection of Principles and Goals in the Science of Timekeeping);³⁴
- x. A majmū'a (compendium) containing Qusta b. Luqa al-Ba'labakki's (d. ca. 912–13) Risāla fi al-'amal bi-al-kura al-falakiyya (Treatise on Using the Celestial Globe) as well as (pseudo-)Aristotle's Risāla al-ghālib wa-al-magh'lūb (The Victorious and the Vanquished), a small treatise on a prognosticative technique deployed to predict the outcome of a battle, which was quite popular among Ottoman taqwīm writers.³⁵

TRACING THE ALMANACS (TAQWĪMS)

Even more curious than the personal ownership notices of Bayezid II is a set of almanacs with prognostications (taqwīms) composed in the first decade of the sultan's reign and embossed with his idiosyncratic almond-shaped seal that appear to be uncatalogued in 'Atufi's inventory.³⁶ While there are approximately thirty surviving Ottoman taqwīms that were composed before the compilation of the library inventory, only three of them bear the seal of Bayezid II. The earliest of these three taqwīms was compiled by Khitabi-i Lahijani (d. after 1495) on the occasion of the new (solar) year in 1489 and is now preserved in the Topkapı Palace Museum Library's Bağdad Collection (TSMK B. 310).³⁷ The other taqwīms with Bayezid's seal are two anonymous ones from the year 1490, one of which is preserved in the same collection (TSMK B. 311) and the other is in the Istanbul Kandilli Observatory Library (MS 365).

The ephemeral nature of annual almanacs might have played a role in their exclusion from 'Atufi's inventory. Despite the fact that almost all extant Ottoman taqwīms are in codex form, they appear to have been considered different from regular books in some respect. The most obvious difference is that they were produced annually and also expired annually. Early modern Ottoman readers were certainly aware of the ephemeral nature of taqwīms. For instance, one malḥama text (a prognosticatory writing related to celestial and meteorological phenomena) produced in the late fifteenth century reminds its readers that taqwīms are rendered ineffective every new year, whereas the malḥama text would survive for many more years to come (taḳvīm gibi yılda bir zāyi' olmaz).³⁸ In a similar vein, Katib Çelebi contrasts his Taqwīm al-tawārīkh (Chronological Tables) with the taqwīms of munajjims, which, he states, by nature annually become invalid (taḳvīm-i aṣḥāb-i tencīm gibi mensūḥü'l-'amel).³⁹

The three aforementioned stamped taqwīms from 1489 and 1490 imply that the seal of Bayezid II was applied immediately after the codices were presented to the court, and not around the time 'Atufi started working on the copies available in the treasury to prepare his inventory. Otherwise, one would expect to find the almond-shaped seal in many of the other surviving taqwīms from 1421 to 1503, most of which are still preserved today in the Topkapı Palace Museum Library collections. This suggests that the custom of impressing the presented copies of manuscripts with the stamp of Bayezid II might have already been practiced in the late 1480s. Unfortunately, there is no extant taqwīm from the reign of Bayezid II composed prior to 1489; hence, we are not in a position to confirm whether those taqwīms produced in the early 1480s would have borne the seal. Yet it seems credible to assume that at a certain juncture, likely around 1490, a final decision was reached to no longer stamp taqwīms with the sultan's almond-shaped seal.

Notwithstanding the fact that taqwīms, even ones bearing the almond-shaped seal, are not listed in 'Atufi's inventory, their contents are crucial for tracking the scholarly references of contemporary astral experts and evaluating more precisely the scope of the palace library vis-à-vis the authoritative texts in astral sciences held therein. We should briefly note that, with all due respect to the significant differences between various examples, a taqwīm is, in principle, an annual presentation combining astronomical, astrological, and calendric information with regard to the upcoming solar year. Seemingly ubiquitous throughout medieval and early modern Islamate culture, especially in the eastern lands, these texts were produced by experts in the science of stars around the time of the year-transfer (taḥwīl-i sāl), that is, the spring equinox and the beginning of the new solar year (nawrūz).⁴⁰

The preparation of these texts required the astral expert to make mathematical and astronomical computations of the celestial positions at the exact moment of the year-transfer, which was necessary for deriving astrological judgments. After identifying the ascendant (tālī')⁴¹ at the time of the year-transfer and establishing other astrological houses by drawing upon the data and methods provided by *zīj*es in circulation, the taqwīm compiler could prepare the horoscope of the coming year. Then he would begin to delineate astrological predictions as to the fortunes of different social categories of people and earthly affairs. In a taqwīm, the detailed astrological section in prose is followed by the laborious tabulation of astronomical, astrological, and calendric information for each solar month of the upcoming year.

Here the taqwīm writer would place ephemeris tables to mathematically demonstrate the celestial positions in each and every day of the month, to mark the corresponding days in the lunar calendar, and to designate the days of religious and liturgical significance in various traditions. These monthly tables are juxtaposed with astrological remarks in the form of inferences of omens (aḥkām) and recommendations for auspicious times to undertake various activities (ikhtiyārāt), based on the interpretation of the individual horoscope of each month as well as the computed planetary aspects.⁴² Finally, the last section of a taqwīm is devoted to the eclipses expected in the upcoming year. If an eclipse was anticipated in that year, information about its projected time, location, and duration would be recorded, along with its astrological interpretation.

As is clear from this brief summary of the contents of surviving taqwīms, there were two major items a munajjim categorically needed to prepare for an accurate taqwīm: (i) a valid zīj to accurately calculate the celestial positions in a given time for a given locality, and (ii) a working astrological textbook describing the dispositions of planets and signs as well as the indications of celestial positions. An astronomical instrument that would help the practicing munajjim determine the required celestial positions more easily and accurately was rather optional, as it was likely unaffordable for many a practitioner.⁴³

While the zīj tradition in the Islamate context dates as far back as the eighth century, with more than 200 such works in different lengths and levels of sophistication surviving to date, a close examination of Ottoman taqwīms reveals that munajjims in the service of the Ottoman court clearly favored the ones prepared in the post-thirteenth-century Persiate East as the fruits of systematic observation programs.⁴⁴ This period was characterized by a heightened interest in conducting systematic observational programs (raṣād) in the newly established observatories to revise the data and parameters conveyed through astronomical tables (*zīj*es). At the end of each systematic observation a new zīj was introduced, with revised figures. The Zīj-i ilkhānī, for example, was produced no later than the early 1270s by Nasir al-Din al-Tusi and his collaborators as part of the brief observational enterprise at the Maragha observatory.

Despite Tusi's high expectations for his work, the Zīj-i ilkhānī did not win much favor among his contemporaries due to its dated parameters and the limited timespan of actual observations prior to its preparation. Thus, soon after its publication, several experts in astral sciences, including 'Ali-Shah Bukhari (d. after 1291), Shams al-Din Muhammad al-Wabkanawi (d. ca. 1320), and Nizam al-Din al-Nisaburi (d. ca. 1329–30), expressed criticisms of the Zīj-i ilkhānī in their own compilations of tables.⁴⁵ Finally, in the first half of the fifteenth century, the Samarqand observatory was established on the initiative of Ulugh Beg, who gathered an impressive array of astral experts, such as Ghiyath al-Din Jamshid al-Kashi, Qadizade al-Rumi, and 'Ali al-Qushji, to conduct a systematic observational enterprise. At the end of this observational program a new zīj was composed that came to be known as the Zīj-i Ulugh Beg (Ulugh Beg Tables) or Zīj-i jadīd-i sultānī (The New Royal Tables).

In surviving fifteenth- and sixteenth-century Ottoman taqwīms, munajjims often cite explicitly which zīj they consulted to make the necessary celestial calculations. Half of the eighteen extant Ottoman taqwīms compiled between 1489 and the year 'Atufi completed his inventory cite as their main source the Verified Ilkhanid Tables (Zīj al-muḥaqqaq al-ilkhānī) that can be attributed to Wabkanawi, whereas four taqwīms made use of the Ulugh Beg tables and only two utilized the Ilkhanid tables.⁴⁶ From the 1510s up until the late sixteenth century, when the most famous Ottoman astronomer of all times, Taqi al-Din (d. 1585), prepared new tables on the basis of his limited observations in the Istanbul observatory, practicing Ottoman munajjims almost exclusively utilized and cited the Zīj-i Ulugh Beg.⁴⁷

Although the zīj collection in the palace library largely reflects the general leanings among practicing munajjims toward the post-Maragha zīj tradition in Persian, it is rather surprising not to come across a single explicit reference to Wabkanawi's Verified Zīj within the palace holdings, given that most court munajjims at the time seem to have based their calculations upon it.⁴⁸ Another remarkable detail about the *zīj*es collected in the imperial treasury is the relatively high number of Nizam al-Din Nishaburi's Kashf-i ḥaqā'iq-i Zīj-i ilkhānī (Uncovering of the Truths of the Ilkhanid Astronomical Handbook of Tables).⁴⁹ Among the twenty-six copies specifically listed as *zīj*es in the inventory and their commentaries—with the exception of the two copies of al-Biruni's al-Qānūn al-Mas'ūdi, which can indeed be regarded as a zīj—five of them (list of entries [76]–[80]) are Nishaburi's Kashf-i ḥaqā'iq, to which contemporary Ottoman munajjims seem to have paid little attention. Similarly, there are two copies of Jamshid al-Kashi's Zīj-i khāqānī fī takmil-i Zīj-i ilkhānī (Astronomical Tables for the Great Khan Prepared for Completing [Tusi's] Ilkhanid Tables) in the palace library (list of entries [44], [45]), although in none of the surviving fifteenth- and sixteenth-century taqwīms is Kashi's zīj preferred. As for the Zīj-i ilkhānī and Zīj-i Ulugh Beg, 'Atufi's inventory lists five copies of each (the former: [164]–[168]; the latter: [178]–[182]). Also cited are two copies of 'Ali al-Qushji's commentary on Zīj-i Ulugh Beg (list of entries [112]/[183], [113]/[184]), and one copy of Mirim Çelebi's commentary on the same text (list of entries [74]/[185]). However, it should be noted that these commentaries were written more in order to explain in prose the challenging parts of the Ulugh Beg tables than to publish new tables; thus, they might not have been used in actual computations. It is also worth noting that the zīj Mevlana Kuçek al-Amasi composed and dedicated to Bayezid II at his gubernatorial seat in Amasya, evidently before January 1477, also ended up in the palace library by the turn of the sixteenth century (list of entries [69]).⁵⁰ Regarding the *zīj*es composed prior to the thirteenth century, the palace library inventory seems to contain only two items: one copy of Kushyar ibn Labban's (d. after 1025) al-Zīj al-Jāmi' (Comprehensive Astronomical Handbook of Tables, list of entries [65]), and one copy that may be attributed to Abu'l-Wafa' Buzjani (d. 997–98), which 'Atufi catalogues as Zīj mawḍū' 'alā mā ṣaḥḥaḥahu al-Shaykh Abū al-Wafā' wa-aṣḥābuhu (Tables Set Forth according to What Was Corrected by the Master Abu al-Wafa' and His Colleagues) (list of entries [24]).⁵¹ As another indication of the supremacy of the Persianate astral tradition in the early sixteenth-century Ottoman world, al-Zīj al-jadīd (The New Astronomical Handbook of Tables) of the famed Mamluk astronomer Ibn al-Shatir (d. ca. 1375) is cited neither in the palace library inventory nor in any of the contemporary taqwīms.

In addition to having the ability to extract the necessary celestial data from *zīj*es, the munajjims had to have a sound knowledge of the nature and indications of planets, signs, astrological houses, and planetary aspects. Although there were several alternative textbooks and summae of astrological principles circulating at the time, the authoritative texts and names quoted heavily in the Ottoman taqwīms and other horoscopes whenever the need to justify a specific astrological indication arose can be grouped as follows:

- i. Kitāb al-thamara (Centiloquium or One Hundred Astrological Aphorisms) attributed to Ptolemy, which was originally composed in Arabic in the early tenth century by a certain Abu Ja'far Ahmad b. Yusuf (d. ca. 944) and later translated into Persian by different parties including Tusi;⁵²
- ii. Nasir al-Din al-Tusi and his Sī faṣḥ;
- iii. Kushyar ibn Labban and his Mujmal al-uṣūl fī aḥkām al-nujūm (Compendium of Astrological Principles, also named al-Mudkhal fī ṣinā'at aḥkām al-nujūm);⁵³
- iv. Abu Rayhan al-Biruni and his Kitāb al-taḥḥīm li-awā'il ṣinā'at al-tanjīm (Book of Instruction in the First Principles of the Art of Astrology);
- v. Abu Ma'shar al-Balkhi (d. ca. 886), though his well-known treatises, such as Kitāb al-mudkhal al-kabīr (General Introduction to Astrology), Kitāb al-mīl al-wa'l-duwal (Book of Religions and Dynasties), and Kitāb al-ulūf (Book of Thousands), are not explicitly cited in the inventory;⁵⁴
- vi. Kifāyat al-ta'lim fī ṣinā'at al-tanjīm (Sufficiency of Learning in the Art of Astrology) of Abu al-Mahamid b. Mas'ud al-Ghaznawi (fl. late twelfth century).⁵⁵

Numerous copies of these titles are catalogued in 'Atufi's inventory, and Tusi's Sī faṣḥ seems to have enjoyed the most popularity. There are, by our count, fourteen copies of this text (list of entries [55]/[153], [144], [145], [146], [147], [148], [149], [150], [151], [152], [154], [155], [156], [157]), including later commentaries, such as Khitabi-i Lahijani's lengthy Muwaḍḍiḥ al-rusūm fī 'ilm al-nujūm (The Expositor of the Notes in the Science of the Stars), which he presented to Mehmed II in December 1479.⁵⁶ Next comes the corpus of Kitāb al-thamara with ten copies (list of entries [81], [82], [83], [84], [85], [86]/[159], [87]/[160], [88]/[161], [89]/[162], [90]/[163])—two of which are cited in the history (tārīkh) section of the inventory—almost all in Persian. That most of the available Thamara copies in the palace library were written in Persian provides yet further proof for the ascendancy of the Persianate astral tradition within Ottoman circles. Ptolemy's major work in astrology, Tetrabiblos (Four Books of the Influence of the Stars), also seems to have been featured in the library, just as two separate copies of al-Battani's (d. 929–30) commentary are listed in the inventory (list of entries [11], [12]).

As for the books of Abu Ma'shar, the celebrated astrologer of Abbasid times, there are six titles recorded with explicit reference to his name (list of entries [1]–[6]). Yet, on the basis of the manuscript evidence with Bayezid's seal, it is safe to assume that some of the items listed in the inventory under different or generic titles might have also contained the works of Abu Ma'shar. For example, a majmū'a now preserved as SK, Ayasofya MS 3600 bears the almond-shaped seal of Bayezid II and hosts Abu Ma'shar's Kitāb taḥāwīl sinī al-mawālīd (Book of the Revolutions of the Years of Nativities), but the title assigned either by 'Atufi or one of his colleagues on fol. 1a of this compendium is Kitāb taqwīm al-adwīya fī al-ṭibb (The Book of the Table of Medicaments in [the science] of Medicine).⁵⁷ In addition to the works of Tusi, (ps.-)Ptolemy, and Abu Ma'shar, the library inventory contains at least eight references to the Mujmal al-uṣūl of Kushyar (list of entries [57]–[64]) and five references to the Kitāb al-taḥḥīm of Biruni (list of entries [17]–[21]). Ghaznawi's Kifāya is also cited at least two times (list of entries [27]–[28]).

Before moving to the next section, we would like to make a few more notes regarding the general works on astrological principles. First, parallel to the dearth of references in the writings of early modern Ottoman munajjims to al-Qabisi (fl. second half of the tenth century), whose introduction to astrology (Kitāb al-mudkhal ilā ṣinā'at al-nujūm) became immensely popular in medieval and Renaissance Europe upon its translation into Latin from Arabic, the palace library has no volume explicitly related to him.⁵⁸ Secondly, another popular (in the sense of the high number of surviving manuscripts) Persian astrological textbook, Laṭā'if al-kalām fī aḥkām al-a'wām (General Astrological Judgments) composed by Sayyid Munajjim (fl. first half of the fifteenth century), is only cited once in the inventory (list of entries [120]).⁵⁹ Finally, we note that the celebrated astrologer from the Abbasid times, Masha'allah ibn Athari (d. ca. 815), is also not mentioned in the inventory, although the taqwīms and other types of horoscopes produced in the early modern Ottoman world occasionally refer to him.⁶⁰

BIRTH HOROSCOPES AND OTHER GENRES

*Zīj*es and astrological textbooks were also put in use in other genres that calculate the horoscope at the hour of an event. The birth horoscope or natal chart, which was prepared primarily for the members of the ruling dynasty, is one such genre. The most famous example of the genre in the entire corpus of Islamicate astrology, due to its captivating illustrations, is the horoscope of the Timurid prince Mirza Iskandar b. 'Umar-Shaykh (d. 1415–16), composed around 1411 by Mahmud b. Yahya b. al-Hasan al-Kashi (d. after 1411), a close relative of Jamshid al-Kashi's.⁶¹ Not surprisingly, 'Atufi's inventory lists Mirza Iskandar's horoscope (list of entries [46]), which must have entered the Ottoman palace library along with other works on the science of the stars produced or circulated in the Timurid realm.⁶²

This lavishly illuminated horoscope was not the only natal horoscope cited in the inventory, however. 'Atufi lists six birth horoscopes cast for members of the Ottoman dynasty. Three of these copies are horoscopes cast for Mehmed II, one of which was prepared by Khitabi-i Lahijani (list of entries: [52], [194]–[195]). Lahijani's text is stamped with Bayezid II's seal and tells us that a royal edition of it was penned in Istanbul in 1481 by Ghiyath al-Mujallid al-Isfahani.⁶³ The other three horoscopes listed in the inventory are for Bayezid II ([197]), his son Mehmed (d. 1505) ([198]), and Prince Cem ([196]). To date, these three natal charts remain undiscovered, and thus we are not in a position to track the scholarly references in these horoscopes.⁶⁴ However, similar to Iskandar's horoscope, the extant birth horoscopes of Mehmed II feature numerous references to Ptolemy, Kushyar, and Abu Ma'shar as authoritative sources.⁶⁵

stars" (min qibal al-nujūm). Another important group of titles classified with the same tag is the corpus on astronomical instruments and treatises on celestial observation. Notwithstanding several exceptions, we can speak here of a pattern observed by 'Atufi throughout the section of books on various celestial pursuits, which is also noted by Jamil Ragep and the McGill Team in their article in this volume. An obvious example of these exceptions is Tusi's popular treatise on the use of the astrolabe, Bīst bāb fī'l-usṭurlāb (Twenty Chapters on Uses of the Astrolabe), referred to nine times in the inventory (list of entries [130]–[136], [26]/[137], [56]/[138]), along with its later commentaries, including that of Efezade (d. after 1495).⁶⁶ This book is sometimes cataloged in the inventory under the rubric of min qibal al-nujūm and sometimes as fī ('ilm) al-nujūm. Likewise, the Kitāb al-thamara corpus is sometimes recorded with the tag fī ('ilm) al-nujūm and sometimes with aḥkām al-nujūm. In general, however, 'Atufi seems to follow a discernible blueprint, cataloging all the *zīj*es and many of the textbooks of an astrological nature under the tags 'ilm al-nujūm or nujūm, and the majority of treatises on instruments of observation under min qibal al-nujūm.

One important aspect of the min qibal al-nujūm subsection is that it also contains very rare examples of relevant works in Turkish.⁶⁷ There are references to at least three copies of Turkish translations of the Mamluk astronomer al-Khalili's (d. ca. 1365) timekeeping tables and astronomical instruments (list of entries [48]/[98], [49]/[99], [50]/[100]), completed by Muhammad b. Katib Sinan al-Qunawi (d. 1524), who worked in the early sixteenth century as the muwaqqit (timekeeper) in various mosque complexes in Edirne and Istanbul.⁶⁸

Titles on specific branches of astrology—such as interrogations or horary astrology (masā'il), which intend to compute and interpret a horoscope for the exact time the client asks questions to the munajjim, and elections (ikhtiyārāt), which is concerned with the choice of an auspicious moment for doing or avoiding a particular activity—are sometimes categorized in the inventory under the rubric of 'ilm al-nujūm and sometimes as aḥkām al-nujūm. One should highlight here the Kitāb al-masā'il of Ya'qub b. 'Ali al-Qasrani (fl. ninth century). Not much is known about him, although later sources, including Fakhr al-Din al-Razi (d. 1210), cite Qasrani among other astrological authorities from the early Abbasid period, including Abu Ma'shar, 'Umar b. al-Farrukhan al-Tabari (d. 815–16), and Sahl b. Bishr (fl. 821–50).⁶⁹ His compilation on horary astrology, which treats a wide array of questions and cases by interpreting the astrological significance of the time when a particular question was posed to him, seems to have been popular in the Ottoman realm. Not only does the palace library inventory cite four copies (list of entries [91]–[94]), but Mirim Çelebi, in his treatise on horary astrology, also recommends that his readers consult Qasrani's compilation for further reading on the topic.⁷⁰ In addition to Qasrani, Fakhr al-Din al-Razi's influential work on electional astrology, al-Ikhtiyārāt al-'alā'iyya fi aḥkām al-samāwīyya (On the Selection of Propitious Times for Various Acts and Affairs), of which al-Razi himself prepared both Arabic and Persian editions, was represented by at least four copies in the palace library according to 'Atufi's inventory (list of entries [114]–[117]).⁷¹ Another important work attributed to al-Razi, al-Sirr al-maktūm (The Hidden Secret), a treatise on celestial magic, is also listed in the inventory at least six times (308 {15}, {16}, {16–17}, {17–18}; 309 {1–2}, {2–3}), albeit it does not appear in this particular section, where titles related to astral and mathematical sciences are enumerated, but rather in the section on natural and occult sciences immediately preceding the quadrivium: Tafṣīl kutub 'ilm al-ta'bīr wa-kutub 'ilm al-firāsa wa-kutub al-'ilm al-kīmīyā' wa-kutub 'ilm al-aḥjār wa-kutub al-raml wa-kutub al-fāl wa-kutub 'ilm al-nayrinjāt wa-kutub al-ṭilsimāt wa-kutub al-sīmiyā' wa-kutub al-'azā'im wa-kutub 'ilm al-jafr wa-kutub al-ṣinā'āt al-'ajība wa-kutub al-ḥiyāl wa-kutub al-siḥr (The Section on Dream Interpretation/Oneiromancy, Physiognomy, Alchemy, Gemology, Geomancy, Divination, Terrestrial Magic, Celestial Magic or Talismans, Letter Magic, Jinn Magic, Letter Divination, Mechanics and Wondrous Devices, Magic).

'ATUFI'S RECLASSIFICATION OF THE ASTRAL AND OCCULT SCIENCES

By locating al-Razi's al-Sirr al-maktūm among titles in natural and occult sciences while listing the same author's work on electional astrology, al-Ikhtiyārāt

al-'alā'iyya, under mathematical sciences, 'Atufi clearly deviates from the more canonical Avicennan tradition, which typically discusses aḥkām al-nujūm under the rubric of natural sciences (tabrī'iyyāt) along with dream interpretation, physiognomy, geomancy, alchemy, and various magical practices. In order to understand why 'Atufi introduced the section on natural and occult sciences immediately before the quadrivium and why he listed all the strictly astrological titles in the latter section, it is necessary to revisit relevant debates in the medieval Islamicate taxonomies of sciences and observe the impact of Persianate encyclopedism, specifically of Razi's Jāmi' al-'ulūm (Compendium of Sciences, also known as Ḥadā'iq al-anwār fi ḥaqā'iq al-asrār or Kitāb-i sittīnī) on the reclassification of astrology under the rubric of mathematical sciences.

Given the great diversity of examples written in different languages, which adopt various methods of classification, it is quite difficult, and indeed misleading, to speak of a single, easy-to-define Islamicate taxonomy of science. The rationale upon which knowledge was hierarchically categorized by various authors varied greatly. Besides such established conventions as dividing knowledge into categories of transmitted ('al-'ulūm al-naqliyya) and rational sciences (al-'ulūm al-'aqliyya), or religious sciences versus the sciences of the ancients ('ulūm al-awā'il), branches of knowledge were also grouped, as in the case of al-Ghazali (d. 1111), into rather subjective categories of praiseworthy, blameworthy, and permissible sciences. Another method, also largely favored by later Ottoman classifiers of knowledge, was the Aristotelian tradition, which found its way into the medieval Islamicate context especially through the works of Ibn Sina (d. 1037) and partially through those of al-Farabi (d. 950).⁷² Accordingly, theoretical philosophy (al-ḥikma al-naẓariyya) is divided into three hierarchical categories, each corresponding to one of the realms of the tripartite scheme of the cosmos. The lowest (asfal), terrestrial world, i.e., the world of generation and corruption, is the main concern of natural and occult sciences, which essentially deal with the sub-lunar domain that is subject to physical change. The study of the middle (awsat), unchanging celestial region requires unwavering mathematical proofs and geometrical demonstrations, whereas the highest ('alā) sphere beyond the celestial orbs concerns metaphysics and theological sciences.⁷³

Within this mainstream Avicennan taxonomy of sciences, astrology (‘ilm aḥkām al-nujūm) was detached from the mathematical investigation of heavenly objects (‘ilm al-hay’a) and classified exclusively as a natural science (al-ḥikma al-ṭabī‘iyya) along with medicine, geomancy, alchemy, and other divinatory practices and arts of magic. The epistemological distinction between the two, however, was neither revolutionary nor entirely unambiguous. For example, Ptolemy covered astronomy in his Almagest, while devoting Tetrabiblos to what he defined as “prognostication through astronomy” (τὸ δι’ ἀστρονομίας προγνωστικόν [to di’ astronomias prognōstikon]); he acknowledged that astronomy was intended for the investigation of the movements of celestial bodies and the planetary aspects, whereas the latter deliberated the corollary changes appearing in the terrestrial realm.

Discussions on the classification of astrology in the medieval Islamic intellectual realm were marked by similar controversies and inconsistencies that were sometimes apparent even in the same work of a single author. Such controversy was mostly due to the subject, methods, and objectives of this science, which, as a contentious discipline, was categorically considered (i) among the sciences of the ancients, which a great many ulema in the Islamic Middle period often took with a grain of salt; (ii) dependent upon the unwavering mathematical knowledge of the heavens but applied to understand the ever-changing physical nature of the sub-lunar world; and (iii) susceptible to being interpreted as a quest threatening to undermine the belief in God’s omnipotence.⁷⁴

Taşköprizade’s treatment of the astral sciences is a perfect example of such complications and inconsistencies. Following the Avicennan model that he largely inherited from the Mamluk encyclopedist Ibn al-Akfani (d. 1348), Taşköprizade makes a clear distinction between ‘ilm al-hay’a and ‘ilm aḥkām al-nujūm, classifying the former in the mathematical sciences (al-‘ulūm al-riyādiyya) and the latter in the natural sciences (al-‘ulūm al-ṭabī‘iyya). At times, he uses ‘ilm al-nujūm and ‘ilm al-hay’a interchangeably and further emphasizes the distinction between ‘ilm al-nujūm and aḥkām al-nujūm by saying that the former relies upon mathematics and calculation (ḥisāb), whereas the latter aims at determining the physical influences in nature.⁷⁵ Nevertheless, in his section on ‘ilm al-hay’a under the general category of mathematical sciences, Taşköprizade lists, among others, ‘ilm al-zījāt wa’l-taqāwīm (the science of astronomical tables and almanacs), ‘ilm al-qirānāt (the science of conjunctions), ‘ilm al-ālāt al-raṣadiyya (the science of the instruments of celestial observation), and ‘ilm al-malāḥim (the science of weather prognostications), all of which, he explicitly maintains, have strong astrological implications.⁷⁶

Unlike Taşköprizade and subsequent generations of well-known Ottoman encyclopedists, including Nev’i Efendi and Katib Çelebi, ‘Atufi emphatically records astrological titles under the rubric of mathematical sciences, right after his section on natural and occult scientific practices. In this regard, he seems to have preferred non-Avicennan models, such as al-Razi’s classification in his Persian encyclopedic work, where aḥkām al-nujūm is deliberately detached from natural and occult sciences and placed right next to ‘ilm al-hay’a under the mathematical sciences.⁷⁷ Razi’s classification exerted an influence on several other examples of the taxonomy of science genre in Persian and also found an enthusiastic reception in the fifteenth-century Ottoman world, particularly within the Fenari circle.⁷⁸ It is worth mentioning here that ‘Atufi’s organization of this section (and others) also accords closely with the schematic classification of the sciences by ‘Abd al-Rahman al-Bistami (d. 1454), a prominent protégé of both Molla Fenari and Sultan Murad II (r. 1421–44; 1446–51) whose works (some in autograph) entered the palace library.⁷⁹ Al-Bistami’s “tree of knowledge,” which is found in his autobiographical bibliography, titled Durrat tāj al-rasā’il (Pearl in the Crown of Tractates), firmly attaches aṣṭrānūmiyā (اسطرنوميا) to the mathematical sciences, while at the same time expressing his commitment to “Greek learning” by using Greek terminology whenever possible.⁸⁰ Thus, ‘Atufi’s deviation from the more canonical, Avicennan tradition is certainly not exceptional and serves as another reminder to modern scholars that the Ottoman taxonomy of science is not singularly represented by Taşköprizade or Katib Çelebi.

A detailed discussion of the titles related to natural and occult sciences in 'Atufi's inventory is beyond the scope of this article. Yet we should note that the occult section of the palace library shows patterns similar to the collection of books on celestial knowledge, insofar as it incorporates works produced in the post-Mongol Persianate world as well as examples from the Graeco-Arabic tradition.⁸¹ For instance, among the no less than twenty-four copies of dream interpretation manuals, six are Hubaysh b. Ibrahim b. Muhammad Tiflisi's (d. ca. 1203–4) Kāmil al-ta'bīr (Compendium of Dream Interpretation), which the author composed in Persian and dedicated to the Rum Seljuq ruler Qilij Arslan II (r. 1156–92) (302 {16–17}, {17}, {18}, {18}, {19}, {19}).⁸² Of the sixteen treatises on physiognomy, the text attributed to Polemon of Laodicea (ca. 88–144 CE), Kitāb Falīmūn or Aflīmūn al-Ḥakīm, stands out with at least four copies (304 {11}, {12}, {12–13}, {15}), next to the physiognomical works of Fakhr al-Din al-Razi (304 {19}–305 {1}) and Muhammad Nurbakhsh (d. 1462) (304 {18}).⁸³

CONCLUSION

Around the time the library inventory was compiled, one of the aspirant munajjims approached Bayezid II in an anonymous Persian petition, asking for access to some of the items in the imperial treasury (khizāne).⁸⁴ The requested items included a complete astrolabe (uṣṭurlāb-i tān), the works Zij-i Ulugh Beg and Kitāb-i Majisṭī, and the horoscope of the sultan (ṭālī-i ḥaẓret-i 'ālem-penāhi) along with those of his sons, Korkud and Ahmed. The anonymous munajjim also reassures the sultan that if the horoscopes are not currently available, he could produce (new) ones for each, so long as he is informed of the exact birthdates of the sultan and the princes.

Except for the horoscopes of Princes Korkud and Ahmed, which are not listed in 'Atufi's inventory, the items that the anonymous munajjim requested accord well with the holdings of the imperial treasury, which, in addition to the books in question, also housed a rich collection of astronomical instruments during Bayezid II's reign.⁸⁵ This raises the questions of whether 'Atufi's inventory was accessible to other members of the palace at the time and whether minor updates were made to the already finished and embellished inventory. Of course, the anonymous aspirant munajjim might have simply heard about these items at the treasury from his colleagues. No matter what the accessibility of 'Atufi's library inventory may have been, the munajjim's petition as well as Bayezid's own reading preferences unequivocally show that the titles on practical astral sciences, particularly those related to the post-thirteenth-century astral lore of the Persianate East, were certainly in use whenever the need arose.

6. El3, s.v. "Astronomy," by Jamil Ragep. Although Jamil Ragep does not specifically refer to aḥkām in his discussion, relevant sources often mention aḥkām within the all-encompassing science of the stars. See n8 below.
7. Modern literature on *zīj*es has barely highlighted the astrological significance of these texts, though scholars are definitely aware of the astrological components in *zīj*es. See Edward S. Kennedy, "A Survey of Islamic Astronomical Tables," Transactions of the American Philosophical Soci-

Ramsay Wright (London: Luzac & Co., 1934), 1; Tūsī, Zīj-i ilkhānī, Biblioteca Medicea Laurenziana MS Or. 24, 2b. Rukn al-Din Amuli, a munajjim active in the Iranian world in the first half of the fifteenth century who composed his own zīj and trained a number of students including Khitabi-i Lahijani, also wrote a treatise on the use of the astrolabe, Panjāh bāb-i sultānī (Fifty Chapters). In this treatise, he states that the ultimate fruit and reward (thamara) of the mathematical sciences (‘ilm-i hay’a, handasa va hisāb) is the science of the judgments [of the stars] (‘ilm-i aḥkām) and the knowledge of [prayer] time[s] (ma’rifat-i avqāt), and that this builds upon the knowledge gleaned from the observation of the [fixed] stars (ma’rifat-i raṣad-i sitāragān), the calculation of the [mean] motions of planets (istikhrāj-i taqvim-i kavākib), and the designation of the ascendants of the hours (ṭavālī-i sā’āt).  10. The discrepancy in numbers is even more significant considering that some of the hay’a books were taught at certain madrasas, and thus more copies of these texts must have been in circulation. See Cevat İzgi, Osmanlı Medreselerinde İlim, 2 vols. (Istanbul: İz, 1997), 1:361–412.

 15. ‘Abdurrahman Munajjim, Jawhar ḥifẓ al-ṣiḥḥat fī al-ṭibb, SK, Ayasofya MS 3635, 2b (also listed in the inventory: 166 [15]). His first instructor, Mevlana Kuçek, was listed in the palace payroll of 1478 as the only royal munajjim at the time under the rubric of müteferriḳa. See Ahmed Refik (Altınay), “Fatih Devrine ait Vesikalar,” Tarih-i Osmani Encümeni Mecmuası 8–11, nos. 49–62 (1335/1919): 1–58. Mevlana Kuçek’s zīj, which was presented to Bayezid II when the latter was still in his gubernatorial seat in Amasya, is recorded in the inventory (list of entries [69]).
 16. İdris-i Bidlisî, Hasht Bahisht, SK, Esad Efendi MS 2198, 33b–34a, also quoted in Tofiq Heiderzaideh, “Ali Kuşçu’nun Astronomi Eserleri” (master’s thesis, Istanbul University, 1997), 15.
 17. Robert Westman’s observation regarding the political instrumentality of astronomical/astrological patronage and the active involvement of the patron in learning the science itself in the early modern European context also holds true for the Islamicate realm. See Robert Westman, “The Astronomer’s Role in the Sixteenth Century: A Preliminary Survey,” History of Science 18, no. 2 (1980): 105–47.

 22. The autograph copy is available at SK, Ayasofya MS 2697. Mirim says in this copy (2a) that he was in the service of Mawlana ‘Ata’ullah, another émigré scholar from Kirman, while ‘Ata’ullah was working on the commentary of the Ulugh Beg tables, probably in Istanbul. Surprisingly, this detail about ‘Ata’ullah is not included in other available copies of the commentary.
 23. List of entries [74]/[185]. So far as it is known, the supplication sallamahu was used for authors who were alive at the time.
 24. Taşköprizāde, 249–50. While the familial ties between Mirim Çelebi and Qutb al-Din are not certain, they appear to be the sons of the same father based on their nisbas given by Taşköprizade. Qutb al-Din’s supercommentary on al-Samarqandi’s Propositions for the Foundation is also listed in the inventory (list of entries [555]/[556]/[565]).
 25. The in‘āmāt defteri (Atatürk Kitaplığı, Muallim Cevdet O. 71) lists all the gifts and payments Mirim and his wife received from the sultan between 1503 and 1512. Another sign of Mirim’s closeness to Bayezid II is that during the

- pro-Selim rebellions in Istanbul in 1511, Mirim's house was targeted along with the mansions of other important individuals who were close to the sultan. See Çağatay Uluçay, "Yavuz Sultan Selim Nasıl Padişah Oldu II," İÜFT Dergisi, 7-10 (1954): 120–21.

 35. SK, Ayasofya MS 2432. This volume should be the one listed as [109].
 36. One entry in 'Atufi's inventory could indeed be interpreted as a taqwīm. The item listed as [239] contains Kitāb jadāwil al-tawārikh wa-al-nujūm (The Book of Chronology Tables and Star Charts). However, we should note that none of the extant taqwīm manuscripts with the seal of Bayezid II bears such a title among its inscriptions.
 37. For more on Khitabi, see Şen, "Reading the Stars," esp. 577–82. Four different works of Khitabi in five copies are listed in the inventory. See the list of entries at the end of our essay: [51]–[55].

 41. Ṭālī' is the point of the Zodiac rising above the horizon at the moment of nativity or any other event on which the horoscope is being cast. See also EL2, s.v. "al-Ṭālī'," by David King and Toufic Fahd. The concept gradually transformed in vernacular Turkish into ṭālīḥ, denoting fortune and luck. It is difficult to ascertain when exactly this transformation occurred, yet as Meniški's Thesaurus Linguarum Orientalium reveals, ṭālīḥ was in use as early as the first half of the seventeenth century.
 42. Ikhtiyārāt (Elections, or Choices) is a major division of astrology by which the munajjim identifies the auspicious time to carry out an activity. EL3, s.v. "Astrology," by Charles Burnett.
 43. In stressing the urgency of the rulers' support, munajjims often referred to the financial difficulty of possessing sizeable and reliable astronomical instruments without assistance from the sovereigns. See, for instance, Rukn al-Dīn Amulī's Panjāh bāb-i sulṭānī or 'Alī-Shah Bukhari's Kitāb athmār wa-ashjār fi al-nujūm (The Book of Fruits and Trees), the latter of which is cited in 'Atufi's inventory as [22]/[165] (see list of entries).

 48. We should also note, however, that some of the "verified" Ilkhanid tables cited explicitly by contemporary Ottoman munajjims in their taqwīms might be referring to different, later editions and commentaries of the Ilkhanid tables, instead of to that of Wabkanawī. Mū'eyyedzade (d. 1516) seems to have had a copy of Wabkanawī's Verified Tables that he purchased in Ladik in 1477. See SK, Ayasofya MS 2694. This copy does not have the idiosyncratic almond-shaped seal of Bayezid II.
 49. For the contents and astrological significance of this zīj, see Robert Morrison, Islam and Science: The Intellectual Career of Nizām al-Dīn al-Nisābūrī (New York: Routledge, 2007), esp. 63–70.
 50. TSMK, R. 1713. The copy has brief notes including an ownership statement on the title page, revealing that the Ottoman scholar-bureaucrat Mū'eyyedzade (d. 1516) used the book for his own calculations of ascendants.

51. The McGill Team notes that the description of this title is strikingly similar to the introduction to Athir al-Dīn al-Abhari's (d. ca. 1265) al-Zij al-shāmil (The Comprehensive Tables).

The first is a book on meteorological/astrological prognostications, Kitāb al-Maḥama al-Turkiyya, cited (list of entries [209]) in the section on 'ilm al-fiqh. The second is a book on the astrological judgments of solar and lunar eclipses, Risāla fī aḥkām al-khusūf wa-al-kusūf bi-al-Turkiyya al-manzūma, recorded (list of entries [257]) in the Turkish poetry section, simply because it is in verse.

76. In Taṣḥkoprizade's elaboration of 'ilm al-qirānāt (the science of conjunctions), for instance, he goes on to say that, as many astral experts state, there is a correlation between the occurrence of grand conjunctions and the shift of dynasties or the emergence of world conquerors such as Alexander the Great, Chingiz Khan, or Timur (ibid., 359–60).

The former manuscript should be the one listed in MS Török F. 59, 303 {12–13}: Kitāb durrat al-funūn fi rū'yat qurrat al-uyūn fi ta-bīr. The latter should be the one listed in MS Török F. 59, 194 {14–15}: Kitāb naẓm al-sulūk fi musāmarat al-mulūk fi al-tawāriḫ al-ghariba.

See TSMA, D. 10026. An earlier register dated 1496 likewise lists astronomical instruments. WORKS ON THE QUADRIVIUM

(Tafşılı kutubi ‘ilmi al-nujūmi wa-kutubi ‘ilmi al-hay’ati wa-kutubi ‘ilmi al-ḥisābi wa-kutubi ‘ilmi al-handasati wa-kutubi ‘ilmi al-mūsīqī)

Following the suggestion of Dimitri Gutas, all commentaries, supercommentaries, and glosses are listed under the title of the work on which they comment, but the authors of these commentaries are also listed separately with full reference to their works in the inventory. Under each author, the works are listed as follows: Integer numbers (1, 2, 3) indicate separate works by the author. Lowercase letters (a, b, c) indicate separate copies of the same work, or separate works with the same title. Decimal numbers (.1, .2, .3) indicate separate commentaries on the original work by various commentators. A second decimal number after a first (.1.1, .1.2, .1.3) indicates a supercommentary on a commentary of the listed work. Lowercase Roman numerals in parentheses, (i), (ii), (iii), indicate that the MS is a translation of the work.

The authors and their works are listed alphabetically. Definite articles, prepositions, and the words R[isāla], M[aqāla], and K[itāb] are disregarded in the alphabetization.

NOTES

Authors’ note: This list includes helpful contributions from Jamil Ragep and the McGill Team (Sally Ragep, Sajjad Nikfahm-Khubravan, Fateme Savadi, and Hasan Umut).

1. Karatay does not list all the works in the volume.
2. This codex is not catalogued in Karatay.

3. 'Atufi notes that the book is also known as K. al-tāj.
4. Since we did not have the chance to see the original manuscript, we are not sure whether this codex bears Bayezid II's seal.
5. Karatay says the work is anonymous.
6. Although 'Atufi does not assign its authorship to Kūshyār, the extant volume contains his treatise on the astrolabe along with Ptolemy's Tasṭīḥ basīṭ al-kura (Flattening the Surface of the Sphere) and Thābit b. Qurṛā's translation of Autolykos (K. al-kura al-mutaḥarriqa).
7. 'Atufi notes that the copy lacks the last part of Book 4.
8. The codex has the seal of Bayezid II and is listed by Zeynep Atbaş. But as Jamil Ragep et al. have noted, Karatay also lists a treatise by Taqī al-Dīn (d. 1585) bound in the same volume. This codex might have been rebound at a later date.
9. See the above footnote.
10. Although 'Atufi does not mention it in the relevant entry, the copy also includes a section from Book 4 of al-Shīrāzī's Durrat al-tāj.
11. 'Atufi notes that the copy contains only Chapter 7.
12. Karatay does not list all the works in the volume.
13. This codex is not catalogued in Karatay.
14. Karatay does not list all the works in the volume.
15. Although 'Atufi does not mention it in the relevant entry, this codex also contains Miftāḥ bīst bāb dar ma'rīfat-i usṭurlāb attributed to al-Ṣūfī.
16. Although 'Atufi does not mention it in the relevant entry, the copy also includes a section from Book 4 of al-Shīrāzī's Durrat al-tāj.
17. Karatay does not list all the works in the volume.
18. The manuscript also contains the Turkish translation of the same horoscope.
19. Although 'Atufi does not mention it in the relevant entry, this volume contains a copy of Kūshyār's Mujmal al-uṣūl.
20. Karatay does not list all the works in the volume.
21. Karatay does not list all the works in the volume.
22. Although 'Atufi does not specify its authorship to Kūshyār, the extant volume houses his treatise on the astrolabe along with Ptolemy's Tasṭīḥ basīṭ al-kura (Flattening the Surface of the Sphere) and Thābit b. Qurṛā's translation of Autolykos's K. al-kura al-mutaḥarriqa.
23. Although 'Atufi does not mention it in the inventory, the extant copy also contains three additional texts on astral sciences: al-Ṭūsī's al-R. al-mu'iniyya, Sharḥ R.-i mu'iniyya, and Mukhtaṣar dar ma'rīfat-i usṭurlāb.
24. Although 'Atufi does not mention it in the relevant entry, the extant copy also contains three additional texts on astral sciences: al-Ṭūsī's al-R. al-mu'iniyya, Sharḥ R.-i mu'iniyya, and Mukhtaṣar dar ma'rīfat-i usṭurlāb.
25. 'Atufi's entry does not specify its authorship to Faṭḥ Allāh al-Shirwānī, but given that in addition to al-Niksārī's supercommentary, there are two additional supercommentaries in the palace library, one written by al-Shirwānī and the other by Sinān Pasha, one of these two entries must be referring to al-Shirwānī's work.
26. 'Atufi's entry does not specify its authorship to Sinān Pasha, but given that in addition to al-Niksārī's supercommentary, there are two additional supercommentaries in the palace library, one written by al-Shirwānī and the other by Sinān Pasha, one of these two entries must be referring to Sinān Pasha's work.
27. Based on extant manuscript record, one of the unidentified commentaries listed under al-Ṭūsī should be al-Jurjānī's work.
28. See note xxv above.
29. See note xxvi above.
30. As far as the relevant catalog entry of Karatay is concerned, the manuscript contains different treatises, including that of al-Ṭūsī and al-Sijzī.
31. See note xxvi above.
32. See note xxv above.
33. Based on extant manuscript record, one of the unidentified commentaries listed under al-Ṭūsī should be al-Shirwānī's work.

34. Although the work has been attributed to Qāḍizāde al-Rūmī, İhsan Fazlıoğlu notes that it should belong to another Şalāḥ al-Dīn Mūsā who lived and flourished before Qāḍizāde al-Rūmī. See Fazlıoğlu, "Kadıze-i Rumi," Türkiye Diyanet Vakfı İslam Ansiklopedisi.
35. According to both the Karatay catalogue and the catalogue of the Süleymaniye Library, the author of this work bearing Bayezid II's seal is a certain Shams al-Dīn Muḥammad al-Khaṭībī. No information has been found about this individual.
36. Cevat İzgi records the title as al-Tajnis fī al-ḥisāb. See Cevat İzgi, Osmanlı Medreselerinde İlim, vol. 1 (Istanbul: İz, 1997), 245–46.
37. 'Atufi registers the title as ḥussāb.
38. The catalogue of the Süleymaniye Library attributes it to al-Ṭūsī.
39. Jamil Ragep et al. note that the codex contains Fanārīzāde 'Alī Çelebī's commentary on Sajāwāndī's al-Tajnis. The listing on the title page corresponds with 'Atufi's entry in the inventory.
40. This could be the work of Ibn al-Haytham.
41. This could be 'Abd Allāh b. Muḥammad b. Kiya al-Māzandarānī's Risāla-i falakiyya. See Die Resalā-ye falakiyyā des 'Abdollah ibn Mohammad ibn Kiya al-Mazandarani: Ein persischer Leitfaden des staatlichen Rechnungswesens (um 1363), ed. Walther Hintz (Wiesbaden, 1952).
42. While MS Török F. 59 transliteration reads it as 'ishra, the entry on Marāghī in the Türkiye Diyanet Vakfı İslam Ansiklopedisi reads it as 'ashara.

ASTRONOMICAL AND OTHER MATHEMATICAL SCIENCES

‘Atufi’s choice to subsume astral sciences, mathematics, music, and amusement¹ into a single section of the inventory needs a brief explanation. In his Republic, Plato famously details the requirement that the Guardians, the future rulers, be trained in mathematics as a way to turn the mind toward the true forms (“being”) and away from the world of the senses (“becoming”). This ideal formed the basis for what would become, in the Latinate world, the “quadrivium,” i.e., the four sciences that could, with some tweaking, be extracted from Book VII of the Republic. Although these four sciences—arithmetic (or, more precisely, number theory), geometry, astronomy, and music—are included within this section of the inventory, Plato’s curriculum for the Guardians, and the quadrivium of medieval Latin universities, does not find an exact correlate within pre-modern Islam. Rather, the entire spectrum of mathematical sciences, whether pure or applied, simplicitur or mixed, came to be called in Arabic al-‘ulūm al-ta’ālīmiyya (the training sciences), a translation of the Greek hai mathēmatikai epistēmai (αἱ μαθηματικαὶ ἐπιστήμαι).² Thus, disciplines extending beyond what was known to Plato, such as trigonometry and algebra, would also be included within this classification. Furthermore, a controversial subject such as astrology, which as a practical discipline would have been scorned by Plato, would sometimes (but not always, as we shall see) find a place within the Islamic mathematical sciences. In short, we need to take into account the particularities of Islamic intellectual history and not assume that a term such as “quadrivium” is necessarily applicable across cultures.

Another issue requiring our attention concerns those sciences with both mathematical and physical components.³ Pace his teacher Plato, Aristotle did not hold that an astronomer could pursue his subject purely mathematically and somehow “let the things [we observe] in the heavens alone.”⁴ Rather, Aristotle held that astronomy and music had physical as well as purely abstract, mathematical sides, which is how they, along with optics and harmonics, came to be regarded as “middle sciences.”⁵ This already creates a problem for any classifier. If astronomical phenomena, for example, are treated strictly mathematically, with the goal being to describe what one sees in the heavens and to predict future positions, then one might wish to distinguish this type of astral science from one that treats the phenomena as due to physical bodies acting in characteristic ways. And indeed, such a distinction had already occurred in antiquity. A purely mathematical approach to the subject, such as that of the Babylonians, was considerably modified by Greek astronomers, who transformed Babylonian numerical cycles into the uniform motion of spherical bodies in the heavens.⁶ These spherical bodies could be mathematically abstracted as circles (as one finds in Ptolemy’s Almagest), which simplifies the calculations, or they could be kept as three-dimensional bodies (as one finds in Ptolemy’s Planetary Hypotheses). Further complicating the issue is that some Greek thinkers considered the nature of the celestial bodies as a matter for natural philosophy rather than astronomy (whether in a work such as the Almagest or the Planetary Hypotheses): thus, the distinction one sees in Geminus (first century CE) between natural philosophy focusing on the why, or reasoned fact (to dihoti), and astronomy, which studies only the fact itself (to hoti).⁷

In order to understand ‘Atufi’s somewhat idiosyncratic cataloguing of the materials in this section of the inventory, let us focus on the “astral” sciences, which he classifies under the rubrics of ‘ilm al-nujūm and ‘ilm al-hay’a, and explore some of the background for classifying the “astral” sciences in Islamic literature, which includes both what we would call astronomy and astrology.⁸

The above distinctions, nuances, and ambiguities were all transmitted, in one form or another, to the Islamic world from the Hellenistic one. By the tenth century, one finds the philosopher al-Farabi (d. 950), the chancery secretary (kātib) Abu ‘Abd Allah Muhammad al-Khwarazmi (fl. tenth century), and the encyclopedists called Ikhwan al-Safa’ (Brethren of Purity, tenth century)⁹ all using the term ‘ilm al-nujūm (science of the stars) to translate astronomia,¹⁰ i.e., a discipline that encompassed mathematical astronomy¹¹ and astrology. Furthermore, both Khwarazmi and the Ikhwan use ‘ilm al-hay’a (science of configuration) to designate one of the branches of ‘ilm al-nujūm. Khwarazmi states that this subdivision has to do with the “knowledge of the arrangement (tarkīb) of the orbs, their configuration (hay’a), and the configuration of the Earth.”¹²

In the next generation, we encounter something new. Ibn Sina (Avicenna, d. 1037) uses the term ‘ilm al-hay’a to designate the mathematical discipline having to do with the external structure of the universe. Astrology (‘ilm al-aḥkām) is no longer listed as a mathematical discipline but is included as part of natural philosophy (al-ḥikma al-ṭabī‘iyya).¹³ Thus, ‘ilm al-hay’a becomes, more or less, what we would call astronomy and includes astronomical tables, instruments, and practical astronomy (such as finding the direction to Mecca). The overarching subject of this reconstituted discipline is “bodies,” both celestial and sublunary. As stated a few centuries later by Nasir al-Din al-Tusi (d. 1274): “The subject of astronomy is the simple bodies, both superior and inferior, with respect to their quantities, qualities, positions, and intrinsic motions.”¹⁴ That the subject matter is “bodies” might appear to indicate that astronomy has become a part of physics or natural philosophy. This topic is discussed at length by various Islamic astronomers, philosophers, and theologians. The consensus (though not unanimous) is that the qualification “with respect to” (in Tusi’s formulation) indicates that astronomy will only study the external aspects of bodies, not their intrinsic natures; the latter is said to be the subject of a work such as Aristotle’s (or Ibn Sina’s) De caelo.¹⁵

In the post-classical period (i.e., after 1200), this new understanding of astronomy as ‘ilm al-hay’a generally holds, though there are some interesting exceptions. Following Ibn Sina, Ibn al-Akfani (d. 1348) in his Irshād (Guide) clearly distinguishes between ‘ilm al-hay’a, which is one of the mathematical sciences, and ‘ilm aḥkām al-nujūm (science of judgments of the stars), which is one of the natural sciences. On the other hand, Ibn al-Akfani does use the term ‘ilm al-nujūm when evaluating the legal standing of the various astral sciences. Finding prayer times is considered obligatory (wājib). Using ‘ilm al-nujūm to show the existence of the Creator, His knowledge and omnipotence is recommended (mandūb). It is permissible (mubāḥ) to study the influence of the stars as being due to habituation (‘āda), but not to nature (bi-al-ṭab‘), the latter being reprehensible (makrūh). The strongest legal injunction, that which is forbidden (maḥẓūr), is reserved for the belief that the stars act independently and are thus deserving of worship. It is reasonably clear, from both this legal aside and the way he categorizes the astral sciences, that Ibn al-Akfani privileges ‘ilm al-hay’a over ‘ilm al-nujūm. This is confirmed inasmuch as he classifies the subdivisions of astronomy under ‘ilm al-hay’a rather than ‘ilm al-nujūm. These five subdivisions are: the science of astronomical tables and ephemerides/calendars (‘ilm al-zījāt wa-al-taqāwīm); the science of timekeeping (‘ilm al-mawāqīt); the science of the methodology of observations (‘ilm kayfiyyat al-arṣād); the science of flattening the sphere [e.g., the astrolabe] (‘ilm taṣṭīḥ al-kura); and the science of shadow instruments [e.g., sundials] (‘ilm al-ālāt al-ẓilliyya).¹⁶ Despite generally adhering to Ibn Sina’s formulation regarding hay’a and nujūm, Ibn al-Akfani’s conceptualization provides a way to legitimize astrology, as long as it does not impinge upon God’s omnipotence.

Moving from the Mamluk region to Ottoman territory, one finds the renowned encyclopedist and theologian Ahmad ibn Mustafa Tashkubrizade (Taşköprizade, d. 1561) more or less following Ibn al-Akfani’s categorization of the astral sciences; ‘ilm al-hay’a is again touted for its exalted subject matter and the certainty of its proofs. Tashkubrizade also quotes a famous Qur’an verse as an indication of hay'a's exalted status: "Whoever—standing, sitting or reclining—recall God and reflect on the creation of the heavens and the Earth [will say]: Our Lord! Thou hast not created this in vain" (Qur'an, III.191).¹⁷ On the other hand, Tashkubrizade leaves little doubt about his disdain for astrology. He lists two uses for *zīj*es and ephemerides: one related to timekeeping, the qibla direction, and prayer times; the other related to judgments in the sublunar, elemental world arising from celestial circumstances, i.e., astrology. He states that only the first use is legitimate and then proceeds to offer a scathing indictment of astrology, saying that it is both unsound from a legal point of view (madkhūlat al-ṣaḥḥa fi al-sharʿ) and weak from a scientific one.¹⁸

One may find Akfani's five subdivisions of hay'a in Tashkubrizade's chapter on the branches of ʿilm al-hay'a, but there is a bewildering range of other sciences listed as well.¹⁹ There are expected subdivisions, such as the constellations, the sizes and distances of the stars and planets, and constructing and using the astrolabe. But he also includes geography of various sorts, wonders of creation literature, and various divisions that would normally be listed under astrology, such as planetary conjunctions, cycles, and ʿilm al-malāḥim, a popular form of yearly prognostication. The problem with this listing of the branches of ʿilm al-hay'a, at least for the purpose of ascertaining Tashkubrizade's understanding of the divisions of the astral sciences, is that in several cases, e.g., for cycles (al-adwār wa-al-akwār) and malāḥim, he states these are subdivisions of aḥkām al-nujūm. However, the subdivisions of aḥkām al-nujūm were already listed previously²⁰ and so it is puzzling that they are listed here under the branches of ʿilm al-hay'a rather than under the branches of aḥkām al-nujūm. What we can conclude is that there is a certain degree of ambiguity regarding how Tashkubrizade has bifurcated ʿilm al-hay'a and aḥkām al-nujūm. Yet there is little justification for inferring from this ambiguity that Tashkubrizade, contrary to what he says, is attempting to surreptitiously provide a justification for aḥkām al-nujūm and its subdivisions.²¹

In his dissertation, Tunç Şen provides additional information that helps us to situate 'Atufi's cataloguing of the astral sciences, which is rather different from what we find in the Avicennian categorizations of Akfani and

Tashkubrizade. Şen points to Fakhr al-Din al-Razi (d. 1210) and Muhammed Shah Fanari (Mehmed Şah Fanari, d. 1436), among other influential writers, who seem to have made aḥkām al-nujūm part of the mathematical sciences, contra Avicenna and his followers. The influence of both writers upon Ottoman thinkers and cataloguers, including 'Atufi, is nicely detailed by Şen.²²

The multifaceted and changing categorization of the astral sciences among the Ottomans is highlighted in the Kashf al-ẓunūn (Removal of Uncertainty) of the renowned Ottoman scholar Katib Çelebi (known as Hajji Khalifa, d. 1657), who uses ʿilm al-nujūm as his main astral category.²³ He begins by defining this discipline as "a science by which one learns the indications for events in the world of generation and corruption from the celestial forms (al-tashakkulāt al-falakiyya)."²⁴ He then mentions three divisions: computations (ḥisābiyyāt), physics (ṭabīʿiyyāt), and speculations (wahmīyyāt). The first two, he assures us, are not contrary to Shari'a law; the last is forbidden if one regards the stars as acting independently. On the other hand, Katib Çelebi cites al-Shafi'i (d. 820), who says there is no harm if one acknowledges the stars as acting through God's habit (ʿāda), a position we have seen with Ibn al-Akfani. It must be admitted that Katib Çelebi's final position is not clear, since he cites both positive and negative positions regarding astrology. For our purposes, he ends his account of ʿilm al-nujūm by citing the four-fold division of 'Ali ibn Ahmad al-Nasawi (eleventh century):²⁵ 1) knowing the unit (raqm) of ephemerides and the astrolabe; 2) introduction to the "science of the stars" and knowledge of the natures and temperaments of the planets and zodiacal signs; 3) on knowing how to calculate the stars and on the construction of *zīj*es and ephemerides/calendars; and 4) knowledge of hay'a and the geometrical proofs for the validity of the operations [related to] the stars. Katib Çelebi also cites Nasawi's statement to the effect that most of his contemporaries have confined themselves to the first two divisions, and that it is rare to find someone with knowledge of the third (and presumably the fourth as well). Does Katib Çelebi agree with this assessment for his own time? This is not clear, but it is interesting to note that his listing for ʿilm al-hay'a (which would presumably include Nasawi's more advanced and mathematically-based third and fourth divisions) is woefully inadequate. He incongruously lists under this rubric a rather non-typical astronomical work by the Andalusian Ibn Aflah (twelfth century); a work on talismans; and Jalal al-Din al-Suyuti's (d. 1505) book on "Sunni hay'a," which is mainly based on the Qur'an, prophetic hadiths, and traditional accounts.²⁶

What makes Katib Çelebi's entries and comments particularly puzzling is that we know from recent research (the Islamic Scientific Manuscripts Initiative²⁷) that there was an upsurge of manuscript copies dealing with hay'a in the seventeenth century, especially in Istanbul. In fact, in a codex (Süleymaniye, Carullah MS 1489) that contains three hay'a works (Qadizade's commentary on Jaghmini's Mulakkhkhaṣ fī al-hay'a and two glosses [hāshiyas] on it), we find a note by the bibliophile Carullah Efendi (seventeenth to eighteenth centuries), who states that the codex is in Katib Çelebi's hand. Carullah adds that Katib Çelebi himself taught the text, presumably meaning Qadizade's commentary, to a certain 'Abd al-Wahhab, who was a teacher of Sultan Süleyman II (d. 1691) (fol. 1a). Moreover, in Kashf al-zunūn, Katib Çelebi himself provides a detailed entry for the Mulakkhkhaṣ, which he refers to as a "famous epitome" (mukhtaṣar mashhūr), and lists some ten commentaries of the work.²⁸

One is tempted to distinguish between someone like Tashkubrizade, the product of a traditional madrasa education and himself a prominent teacher, and Katib Çelebi, a self-educated individual and someone associated more with the scribal bureaucracy than the madrasa.²⁹ Did this cause Katib Çelebi to prioritize 'ilm al-nujūm' over 'ilm al-hay'a'? This is one possibility, but we need to be cautious given our present state of knowledge. As we have seen, there is a great deal of ambiguity and difference of opinion regarding the Avicennian separation of 'ilm al-hay'a' and aḥkām al-nujūm in the post-classical period, so it may not be possible to correlate them fully with madrasa and court contexts, respectively. To emphasize this point, we have the example of Sinan Pasha (d. 1486), who not only served for many years as a teacher in various madrasas, but also as vizier and tutor of Sultan Mehmed II (r. 1444–46, 1451–81) until he fell out of favor. On the one hand, he wrote vehemently against the munajjims and astrology; on the other, he was a practitioner of hay'a, extolling its virtues in a gloss on Qadizade's commentary on Jaghmini's Mulakkhkhaṣ that he evidently used for teaching. Interestingly, Sinan Pasha dedicated the work to Sultan Bayezid II.³⁰

Let us now turn to the categorization of the mathematical sciences in 'Atufi's inventory, using the above discussion to help us make sense of his listings. First let us recall the obvious, which is that 'Atufi was working in a court context. But we should acknowledge that he demonstrates a wide-ranging knowledge of the entirety of the sciences, both religious and non-religious; here we note that 'Atufi also wrote on the medical sciences.³¹ Given his writings on tafsīr and ḥadīth, as well as the fact that he had been a mudarris (teacher in a madrasa), 'Atufi no doubt had a traditional education.³² Like many scholars of his time, he very likely had a high regard for the mathematical sciences, which were often held, even by the more religiously inclined, to be beyond reproach.³³ Although it had a mathematical basis, astrology occupied a much more ambiguous position, as we have seen. These considerations may help us to understand the hybrid nature of 'Atufi's categorization, at once reflecting the important status of astronomy (especially hay'a works) as having a place in madrasa teaching while also acknowledging astrology (and other occult sciences) as an important part of court culture at the time.

This conceptualization is reflected in 'Atufi's categories of nujūm and hay'a. The former encompasses works on practical astronomy, including astrology, religious ritual, instrument making, calendars, and other practical applications. The category of hay'a is, in general, being used for works on theoretical astronomy, whether these be hay'a basīṭa (simple hay'a, without extensive geometrical proofs and derivations) or hay'a mabsūṭa (extended hay'a, with proofs and derivations such as one finds in the Almagest). Aḥkām al-nujūm has been reserved for astrological works. Generally speaking, then, we can say that 'Atufi has opted to include astrological works among the mathematical sciences, which puts him outside the Avicennian/Akfani tradition. However, this is not inconsistent with Tashkubrizade's long list of subdivisions of hay'a that rather incongruously includes some astrological subdivisions. It is also consistent with Tashkubrizade's remark that practical astronomy can be used for religious purposes and for astrological ones. So, despite the objections of someone as prominent as Sinan Pasha, Bayezid II's librarian could place astrological works within the exalted category of the mathematical sciences.

As for the other mathematical sciences, works categorized under arithmetic, geometry, and music follow more predictable patterns already set in antiquity. One must note, however, certain sub-disciplines that were reformulated or radically transformed within Islamic traditions. These include trigonometry, which Islamic mathematicians built into a relatively new discipline based upon the Indian sine function, and algebra, which they systematized using the practical procedures of the Babylonians and the apodictic methods of Greek geometry. Practical arithmetic itself was transformed due to the inheritance of different techniques and number systems from Babylonia, Greece, and India. And Islamic scholars came to deal with music, both practically and theoretically, in new ways as a result of their encounters with the many traditions that existed in the vast Islamic realms.

In what follows, we deal with the disciplines that appear in 'Atufi's section on mathematical sciences. By our count, there are approximately five hundred works that he lists, and he uses some twenty-one major classifications to categorize them (see our chart at the end of this essay).³⁴ Some of these classifications are virtually synonymous (e.g., hay'a and ilm al-hay'a) and are used interchangeably to identify the same work. Nevertheless, we have listed works under such categories separately so that patterns may be easily identified. The categories in the first vertical column of the chart are mainly those of 'Atufi; categories in the top horizontal row represent modern designations. Endnotes to the number of entries in each category refer, in general, to the bracketed numbers (e.g., [123]) in Tunç Şen and Cornell Fleischer's list of entries, which appears at the end of their essay in this volume. We should emphasize that our chart does not encompass mathematical works that appear in other sections of 'Atufi's inventory; we also have not listed works in this section that do not belong to the mathematical sciences. Thus, the chart does not completely overlap with Şen and Fleischer's list of entries.

In the following sections, we deal with individual disciplines using categories from the top row: astrology, *zīj*es/astronomical tables, astronomical instruments, hay'a/theoretical astronomy, arithmetic, geometry, and music. We do not deal with the idiosyncratic inclusion of chess, which 'Atufi may have considered as a game requiring mathematical skill.³⁵

THE ASTROLOGICAL CORPUS

Before dealing generally with the classification of astrological works in 'Atufi's inventory, we should mention the branches of astrology that were widely accepted in the pre-modern Islamic period. Al-Qabisi (fl. second half of the tenth century), who lived in Iraq and Syria, was considered among the most authoritative astrologers of the pre-modern period, both in the Islamic world and Latin Europe.³⁶ Therefore, his classification of the astrological disciplines will help us situate 'Atufi's listings. In his work entitled Risāla fī imtiḥān al-munaḥḥimīn (Treatise on the Examination of Astrologers), al-Qabisi lists five branches of astrology: 1) historical astrology, which deals with nations, religions, and regions, historically for the former two, and naturally for the latter (i.e., weather forecasting); 2) genethliology or nativities (mawālīd), generally concerned with casting horoscopes on the individual's time of birth; 3) anniversary horoscopes, which deal with "the revolutions of the years of the nativities" (taḥāwīl sinī al-mawālīd). Like genethliology, this also involves casting a horoscope for an individual's birthday, but its goal is specifically to obtain guidance for the immediately following year; 4) interrogations (masā'il), used to determine whether or not one should perform an action; and 5) elections (ikhtiyārāt) for determining the best time to perform or avoid a specific action.³⁷

Eighty-seven titles among those listed under the mathematical and astral sciences are directly related to one of the astrological branches mentioned above.³⁸ Among these are some of the most significant and widely circulated astrological books in Islamic history. This leads us to think that those who contributed to the formation of the collection over the years possessed considerable astrological interest and knowledge—both theoretical and practical. To give a few examples, authoritative works written by Ptolemy (d. after 150), Abu Ma'shar (d. 886), Kushyar ibn Labban (fl. second half of the tenth and early eleventh centuries), and Nasir al-Din al-Tusi (d. 1274) are found in many codices in the collection.³⁹ 'Atufi himself uses several designations for the works we have categorized as astrological, which gives us an indication of how he conceptualized astrology and related sciences. These include aḥkām al-nujūm (the judgments of the stars), 'ilm aḥkām al-nujūm (the science of the judgments of the stars), ikhtiyārāt al-nujūm (elections of the stars), nujūm (the stars), 'ilm al-nujūm (the science of the stars), and min qibal al-nujūm (pertaining to the stars) to denote astrological works in the collection. A few astrological works do not include any specification.⁴⁰

As mentioned above, aḥkām al-nujūm is the general term that denoted astrology throughout Islamic history, and 'Atufi's consistency in using this term exclusively for astrological works indicates a historical continuity in the way the term was used. Another term 'Atufi used for astrological works, ikhtiyārāt al-nujūm, is also straightforward;⁴¹ as we learned from Qabisi, this is a subcategory of astrology dealing with the choice of the auspicious or inauspicious moment for actions in the future.⁴² On the other hand, the use of terms such as nujūm, 'ilm al-nujūm, and min qibal al-nujūm for certain astrological works is intriguing, given the fact that many works on instruments, astronomical tables (*zīj*es), constellations, calendars, and even finding the direction of the qibla are also categorized by 'Atufi under the rubric of nujūm. Therefore, one might wonder how interrelated the categories nujūm and aḥkām al-nujūm are in 'Atufi's classification.

In their article in this volume, Tunç Şen and Cornell Fleischer also point out the same issue, dealing with the aforementioned terms in relation to the term hay'a as well as to each other. They also aim to contextualize 'Atufi's categories with respect to the discussions that emerged in post-thirteenth-century Iran and Central Asia regarding the classifications of sciences. Şen and Fleischer likewise indicate that boundaries between 'Atufi's categories for the astral sciences cannot be strictly delineated. Their argument is that, especially due to the influence of Fakhr al-Din al-Razi (d. 1210), subsequent literature on the classification of astrology tends to view it within the mathematical sciences rather than as part of natural philosophy (an earlier view belonging to Ibn Sina and his followers).⁴³

Concerning the use of categories with the term nujūm, it is important to note that in a few instances 'Atufi uses different classifications for works in the same genre, and even for multiple copies of the same work. For instance, horoscopes for Sultan Mehmed II (d. 1481) are listed under min qibal al-nujūm, whereas the horoscope for Cem Sultan (d. 1495), one of Sultan Mehmed II's sons, is categorized under fi al-nujūm.⁴⁴ A more striking example is that most copies of pseudo-Ptolemy's Thamara (Fruit) and its derivatives are specified as aḥkām al-nujūm, whereas one of its translations into Persian is classified under al-nujūm.⁴⁵ Though these few examples do not provide enough evidence to conclude that 'Atufi uses those specifications interchangeably, it can be safely assumed that nujūm was a generic term that could be applied to many of the astral works in the collection, except for theoretical astronomy (hay'a), whereas aḥkām al-nujūm was reserved for astrology.⁴⁶

ZĪJES AND TABLES

In the Islamic astronomical tradition, the term zīj,⁴⁷ which originated from Middle Persian, refers to a specific genre of mathematical astronomical writings.⁴⁸ The history of the genre spans twelve centuries, starting with the translation of astronomical texts into Arabic from Sanskrit, Middle Persian, and Greek in the eighth century and ending in the twentieth century. Around 250 Islamicate exemplars of this genre in various languages have been recorded in bibliographies. These exemplars differ in structure and content due to the evolution of the genre over time. In its standard form, however, which was established at an early date, this genre consists mainly of astronomical tables and covers four primary topics: a) calendars; b) trigonometric functions; c) calculation of planetary positions; and d) mathematical astrological functions. Many *zīj*es also included a star catalogue, a table of coordinates of localities, and qibla direction tables. The genre was influenced directly by developments and improvements in other fields, ranging from observational techniques and trigonometric theorems to mathematical geography and astrology. New observations were an important motivation for the composition of new *zīj*es throughout the Islamic period; other motivating factors included making the material more accessible to a wider audience and providing more practical techniques.

There are several phases in the history of *zīj*es. However, for this brief account, we will focus on the period between the thirteenth and fifteenth centuries.⁴⁹ After the fall of Baghdad in 1258, Nasir al-Din al-Tusi, who had already written numerous astronomical works, established an observatory in Maragha in northwestern Iran in order to undertake new observations and to compose a new zīj based on those observations. The outcome, entitled Zīj-i Īlkhānī (The Ilkhanid Tables), was brought forth sometime after 1272.⁵⁰ As news of the activities in Maragha spread throughout the Islamic world, the results were eagerly awaited, and soon Tusi's zīj became widely known. Although the introduction to the zīj implies that it is based on the new observations carried out in Maragha, little was new in terms of the parameters used for the calculation of tables. Hence, shortly after the publication of the Zīj-i Īlkhānī, several astronomers criticized it; some compiled new tables meant to replace or supplement the work. Among the latter was Muhyi al-Din al-Maghribi (d. 1283), who conducted his own observations at Maragha and composed his own zīj.⁵¹ Among those who criticized the Zīj-i Īlkhānī were 'Ala' al-Munajjim al-Bukhari (d. ca. 1291) in al-'Umda-i Īlkhāniyya (Ilkhanid Pillar);⁵² Nizam al-Din al-Nisaburi (d. ca. 1330) in Kashf-i ḥaqā'iq-i Zīj-i Īlkhānī (Uncovering the Truth of the Ilkhanid Tables; compiled in 708/1308–9);⁵³ and Muhammad ibn 'Ali al-Wabkanawi in his al-Zīj al-muḥaqqaq al-sultānī 'alā uṣūl al-raṣad al-Īlkhānī (Verified Royal Tables Based on the Ilkhanid Observation Principles; compiled ca. 720/1320), who used Maghribi's parameters in his zīj.⁵⁴ These critiques mostly focus on the disagreement between the Maragha observations and the outcome of the zīj for planetary positions.⁵⁵

About a century and a half after the establishment of the Maragha observatory, Ulugh Beg (d. 1449), the grandson of Tamerlane (Timur) and the governor of Transoxiana, established an observatory in Samarqand that became an attractive destination for scholars.

Ghiyath al-Din Jamshid al-Kashi (d. 1429) presented his Zīj-i Khāqānī dar takmil-i Zīj-i Īlkhānī ("Khāqānī" Tables Complementing the Ilkhanid Tables) to Ulugh Beg upon his arrival in Samarqand.⁵⁶ Despite his criticism of Zīj-i Īlkhānī, Kashi adopted its planetary mean motion parameters in his zīj. Ulugh Beg, who was not only a patron of mathematics and astronomy, but was also quite knowledgeable about the subjects, was not satisfied with Kashi's zīj and so asked him to supervise the construction of instruments for the observatory, make new observations, and compose a new zīj. Qadizade al-Rumi (d. after 1440) and 'Ali Qushji (d. 1474) were among the scholars who collaborated in these observations. Finally, in 841/1437, the zīj was completed. Many manuscript copies of this zīj are extant under different titles, such as Zīj-i Ulugh Beg (Ulugh Beg's Tables), Zīj-i Gūrkānī (The Gurkani Tables), and Zīj-i jadīd-i sultānī (The New Royal Tables).⁵⁷ Imad al-Din al-Bukhari, an astronomer close to Ulugh Beg, tells us that after the appearance of this zīj, he prepared annual taqwīms (yearly planetary ephemerides) for Ulugh Beg. In the course of computing these ephemerides, he managed to simplify the calculation process for the moon and presented the solution to Ulugh Beg. After the death of Ulugh Beg, using the same technique, he composed two sets of tables for the moon and Mercury and dedicated them to the Timurid sultan Abu Sa'id (r. 1451–69). Copies of these tables, called Tashīl-i Qamar (Facilitating [the calculations of] the Moon) and Tashīl-i 'Uṭārid (Facilitating [the calculations of] Mercury), found their way to Bayezid II's library.⁵⁸

'Ali Qushji, who participated in the Samarqand observations, left Samarqand after Ulugh Beg's death in 1449. He would eventually arrive in Istanbul around 1472, after having spent time at other courts in Central Asia and Iran. Sometime between 1449 and 1472, he wrote his commentary on Zīj-i Ulugh Beg, which was one of many works that he brought with him to Ottoman lands.⁵⁹ Qushji's great-grandson, Mirim Çelebi (d. 1525), who was also a great-grandson of Qadizade al-Rumi and a contemporary of 'Atufi, wrote a commentary on Zīj-i Ulugh Beg as well and dedicated it to Bayezid II.⁶⁰

one of the astronomers in Bayezid II's court, seems to have conducted a series of observations in Istanbul using some instruments he constructed. In his Tashrīḥ al-ālāt fī sha'n al-imtiḥānāt (Description of Instruments Pertaining to Testing), written in 1483 and dedicated to Bayezid II, Khitabi refers to criticisms directed against the Zīj-i Īlkhānī. He states that there were inconsistencies between this zīj and others; hence, he intended to examine these differences with the help of his own observations. According to Khitabi, such an examination had not been possible until the time of Bayezid II, under whose patronage he finally managed to construct the instruments and perform observations.⁶¹ Another indication of Bayezid II's patronage of astronomical tables comes from the royal timekeeper Muhammad ibn al-Katib Sinan al-Qunawi (d. ca. 1523–24), who may also have been known as Muhammad ibn Yusuf. In addition to several works on instruments (for which see below), this Qunawi translated (or reworked) into Turkish al-Jadwal al-āfāqī (The Table of Horizons) by the Damascus astronomer Shams al-Din al-Khalili (d. ca. 1360). The work consists of auxiliary tables for solving problems of spherical astronomy for all latitudes.⁶²

There are four additional *zīj*es in 'Atufi's inventory. One is recorded as Zīj mawḍū' 'alā mā ṣaḥḥaḥahu al-Shaykh Abū al-Wafā' wa-aṣḥābuhu (Tables Set Forth according to What Was Corrected by the Master Abu al-Wafa' and His Colleagues).⁶³ This description is strikingly similar to the introduction to Athir al-Din al-Abhari's (d. ca. 1265) al-Zīj al-shāmil (The Comprehensive Tables):

This is a zīj that I composed based on the mean motions corrected by the master Abu al-Wafa' Muhammad ibn Ahmad al-Buzjani and his colleagues through their continuous observations and examinations done after Ma'mun's observation. The author of al-Zīj al-'Alā'i, due to his lack of fair-mindedness, used these mean motions, claiming that they were obtained through observations by instruments he himself made use of, despite his not being known as an observer. I found a table in the works of al-Buzjani containing these mean motions.⁶⁴

The composition date of al-Zīj al-shāmil is not known, but it probably was written around 1255. This zīj was well known among the astronomers in Bayezid II's court, since Yazdanbakhsh ibn Pir 'Ali al-Amasi, known as

Mawlana Kuchak (d. after 1476), wrote a Zīj mujmal (Summary Tables) based on al-Zīj al-shāmil. He dedicated the work to Bayezid II, and a copy of it is in 'Atufi's inventory.⁶⁵

The third of these additional *zīj*es recorded by 'Atufi is Kushyar ibn Labban's al-Zīj al-jāmi' (Comprehensive Tables; early eleventh century).⁶⁶ This zīj, which was quite influential, was mainly based on the parameters in the zīj of al-Battani (d. 929). The last zīj is Biruni's al-Qānūn al-Mas'ūdī (The Mas'udi Canon; written around 1030) for which 'Atufi reports two copies.⁶⁷ This was among the most important *zīj*es of the pre-modern Islamic period.

As indicated in our chart, 'Atufi used the classification nujūm for the vast majority of *zīj*es in Bayezid II's library.

ASTRONOMICAL INSTRUMENTS

Islamic monographs on astronomical instruments may be categorized as follows: 1) using regular plane astrolabes; 2) construction of astrolabes; 3) construction and use of innovative astrolabes; 4) celestial globes; 5) armillary spheres; 6) observational instruments; 7) sundials; 8) quadrants and other kinds of calculation devices; and 9) works dealing with multiple astronomical instruments. 'Atufi's inventory is mainly limited to works on astrolabes, multiple instruments, globes and spheres, quadrants and calculation devices, and observational instruments.

Works on using the regular plane astrolabe represented a popular tradition throughout the Islamic period. The most important early work on the astrolabe in Bayezid II's collection is the Arabic version of Ptolemy's Planisphaerium (Fī taṣṭīḥ basīṭ al-kura, Flattening the Surface of the Sphere). Interestingly, 'Atufi does not list this work, but we can surmise that it is included in the codex he refers to as Majmū'a min rasā'il fī 'amal al-ṣafīḥa wa-'amal al-uṣṭurlāb wa-ghayriḥā (A Collection of Treatises on Making the Plate and Making the Astrolabe, and Other [works]).⁶⁸ This book, whose original Greek version is lost, is the most important ancient work on stereographic projection and lays the theoretical foundation for the construction of astrolabes.

There were a number of early Islamic works on the astrolabe; 'Atufi included 'Ali ibn 'Isa al-Usturlabi's (fl. ca. 825) Kitāb al-'amal bi-al-uṣṭurlāb (Book of Using the Astrolabe).⁶⁹ But he makes no mention of al-Kāmil fī ṣinā'at al-uṣṭurlāb (A Complete [work] on the Construction of the Astrolabe) by al-Farghani (fl. ca. 855), which was another influential early work.⁷⁰

Under the patronage of the Buyids (mid-tenth to mid-eleventh centuries), several scholars wrote on the astrolabe and related instruments. Abu Hamid Ahmad ibn Muhammad al-Saghani's (d. 989–90) Kitāb fī kayfiyyat taṣṭīḥ al-kura 'alā saṭḥ al-uṣṭurlāb (Book on the Method of Projecting the Sphere onto the Plane of the Astrolabe) was an important work from this period. Again, this is in Bayezid II's library but was not specifically inventoried by 'Atufi under that title, since the work was in a multi-title compendium.⁷¹ 'Abd al-Rahman al-Sufi (d. 986–87) was another scholar from this period who wrote on the astrolabe. Three of his treatises (all in Arabic) were each known as Kitāb fī al-'amal bi-al-uṣṭurlāb (Book on Using the Astrolabe): one consists of about 400 chapters; the other has 1,760 chapters; and the third has 170 chapters. 'Atufi recorded two copies of Sufi's work on the use of the astrolabe, the 400-chapter work, and another that remains unidentified as to its version.⁷² Beyond the Buyids, Kushyar ibn Labban al-Jili in the eleventh century wrote Risāla fī al-uṣṭurlāb (Treatise on the Astrolabe), which was not recorded by 'Atufi but was in the library,⁷³ and in the twelfth century Ibn Salah al-Hamadani (d. 1154) wrote Kitāb fī kayfiyyat taṣṭīḥ al-basīṭ al-kurī (Book on the Method of Projecting a Sphere onto a Plane), which is not explicitly inventoried by 'Atufi but is contained in a miscellany that he does list.⁷⁴

In the inventory is a copy of the thirteenth-century work by the Rasulid sultan of Yemen, 'Umar ibn Yusuf ibn 'Umar al-Ashraf (d. 1297), entitled Manhaj al-ṭullāb fī 'amal al-uṣṭurlāb (The Students' Course on the Use of the Astrolabe).⁷⁵ Also from the thirteenth century are four copies of Nasir al-Din al-Tusi's Bīst bāb dar ma'rifat al-uṣṭurlāb (Twenty Chapters on Understanding the Astrolabe), which gave rise to an extensive commentary tradition.⁷⁶ Commentaries in 'Atufi's inventory include Shams al-Ma'ali Muhammad Kia' al-Jurjani's Miftāḥ-i Bīst bāb (The Key to Bīst bāb), which was written in 1414;⁷⁷ and a commentary by one of Qushji's students, Fasih al-Din Muhammad ibn 'Abd al-Karim al-Nizami (fl. ca. 1475) that was copied for Bayezid II in 896/1490–91 under the title Mi'yār-i āftāb (Scale of the Sun). Nizami originally wrote his commentary on Bīst bāb in Herat and dedicated it to 'Ali Shir Nawa'i (d. 1501) under the title Maṭla' al-anwār (The Rising Place of Lights).⁷⁸ Other commentaries on Bīst bāb listed in the inventory include one by Muhammad ibn Hajji Sulayman al-Bursawi, known as Efezade (fl. ca. 1495), dedicated to Bayezid II;⁷⁹ and a Kitāb Bīst bāb al-muḥashshā (The Book Bīst bāb with Glosses).⁸⁰ 'Atufi also recorded several other treatises on the astrolabe.⁸¹

Under the Buyids, we begin to see works dealing with multiple astronomical instruments, some of which are featured in the palace library inventory. Perhaps the first of these is due to 'Abd al-Jalil al-Sijzi (fl. second half of tenth century). In addition to inventing a number of instruments and writing monographs on them, he compiled Kayfiyyat ṣinā'at al-ālāt al-nujūmiyya (Method for Constructing Astronomical Instruments), sometimes referred to as Kitāb fī 'amal al-uṣṭurlāb (Book on Making the Astrolabe), dedicated to the construction and usage of a variety of astronomical instruments. (This work is not explicitly recorded by 'Atufi, but is part of a miscellany that he does list.⁸²) Sijzi's work was probably the main source of inspiration for Abu al-Rayhan al-Biruni's (d. ca. 1050) Istī'āb al-wujūh al-mumkina fī ṣinā'at al-uṣṭurlāb (Understanding All Possible Ways of Constructing the Astrolabe), a work that became more popular than Sijzi's; 'Atufi records two copies.⁸³ Sharaf al-Din Abu 'Ali al-Hasan ibn 'Ali al-Marrakushi's (fl. late thirteenth century) Jāmi' al-mabādi' wa-al-ghāyāt (Collection of Principles and Goals) may also be considered among this group of multifaceted works; two copies are listed in the inventory.⁸⁴

Several works on spherical astrolabes, celestial spheres, and armillary spheres are enumerated in 'Atufi's inventory. One of the important figures in this field is Qusta ibn Luqa (d. ca. 912), whose Kitāb fī al-'amal bi-al-kura al-falakiyya (Book on Using the Celestial Globe) is well represented in the inventory.⁸⁵ Other works in this field listed by 'Atufi are Hamid ibn 'Ali al-Wasiti's (fl. ca. 950) Risāla fī al-'amal bi-al-uṣṭurlāb al-kurī (A Treatise on Using the Spherical Astrolabe);⁸⁶ 'Abd al-Rahman al-Sufi's Kitāb fī al-'amal bi-al-kura (Book on Using the Sphere);⁸⁷ and Mu'ayyad al-Din al-'Urđi's (d. ca. 1266) Risāla al-'amal bi-al-kura (Treatise on Using the Sphere).⁸⁸ 'Atufi also lists four other works on the spherical astrolabe.⁸⁹

Works on quadrants and calculation devices are also found in 'Atufi's inventory. These were often written by timekeepers (muwaqqits), a number of whom flourished during the Ayyubid and Mamluk periods in Syria and Egypt. Although several prominent exemplars of this tradition are missing in Bayezid II's library (for example, those of Ibn al-Shatir [d. 1375–76], the renowned timekeeper of the Umayyad Mosque in Damascus), many others are represented, including Ottoman ones.⁹⁰

Although Abu 'Ali al-Marrakushi was not, as far as is known, a muwaqqit, his above-mentioned work coincided with the establishment of the office of timekeeper in Egypt; it thereafter served as a major textbook for timekeepers throughout Islamic lands.⁹¹ 'Abd al-'Aziz ibn Ahmad ibn Sa'id al-Damiri al-Dirini's (d. late thirteenth century) Yawāqūt al-mawāqūt (The Rubies of Timekeeping), a versified treatise on timekeeping, is in the collection.⁹² Two or three works of Muhammad ibn Ahmad ibn 'Abd al-Rahim al-Mizzi (d. 1349) are also recorded: Kashf al-rayb fi al-'amal bi-al-jayb (Dispelling Doubt in Working with the Sine Quadrant);⁹³ al-Rawḍāt al-muzhirāt fi al-'amal bi-rub' al-muqanṭarāt (Flower-Filled Gardens for Using the Almucantars Quadrant);⁹⁴ and a work on an unspecified quadrant.⁹⁵ The aforementioned Muhammad ibn Katib Sinan al-Qunawi, a muwaqqit affiliated with Bayezid II's court who translated al-Khalili's "Table of Horizons" into Turkish (see above), also had several works dealing with instruments that are listed by 'Atufi.⁹⁶ He dedicated his Tuḥfat al-fuqarā' (Gift of the Impoverished), a work on the quadrant, to one of the sultan's sons.⁹⁷ Qunawi's Tabyīn al-awqāt fi ma'rifat waḍ' al-rukhāmāt (Explanation of Times for Understanding the Setting up of Sundials)⁹⁸ and Mūḍih al-awqāt fi ma'rifat al-muqanṭarāt (Elucidator of Times on Understanding the Almucantars [quadrant])⁹⁹ are dedicated to Bayezid II, as is Qunawi's Turkish translation of a certain Risāla fi al-jayb (Treatise on the Sine [quadrant])¹⁰⁰ and his translation of Khalili's tables. Munajjim Bali (d. after 1481), another astronomer in Bayezid II's court, wrote a Persian work entitled Risālat tuḥfat al-faqīr fi rub' al-dā'ira (Treatise of the Gift of the Impoverished on the Quadrant) that is in the inventory.¹⁰¹ 'Atufi also lists other works on the quadrant.¹⁰²

Among the works on observational instruments in Bayezid II's collection was Mu'ayyad al-Din al-'Urđi's Kayfiyyat al-arṣād (The Method of Observations). This work explains the construction and usage of observational instruments built for the Maragha observatory.¹⁰³ Khitabi Munajjim al-Husayni al-Lahijani's Tashrīḥ al-ālāt fi sha'n al-imtiḥānāt (Description of Instruments Pertaining to Testing), discussed above under Zijes/Tables, also is a work on observational instruments that 'Atufi lists.¹⁰⁴ Moreover, there are several works in the palace library on shadow instruments.¹⁰⁵ 'Atufi includes other works on astronomical instruments as well in his inventory.¹⁰⁶ He recorded some seventy-one works on instruments. Of these, fifteen are under nujūm, twenty-two are listed as min qibal al-nujūm, and thirty are uncategorized. For further details, see the chart at the end of this essay.

HAY'A / THEORETICAL ASTRONOMY

The largest number of works dealing with the mathematical sciences in 'Atufi's inventory is categorized as hay'a.¹⁰⁷ These treatises—or the genre of astronomical literature termed 'ilm al-hay'a—attempt to explain the configuration (hay'a) or physical structure of the universe as a coherent whole, meaning the physical, simple bodies that compose both the celestial region and the lower bodies of the terrestrial realm.¹⁰⁸ This comprehensive way of dealing with bodies was an innovation that differentiated Islamic science from that of the astronomy of the ancient Greeks in that it brought together the unchanging realm of the celestial aether and the ever-changing realm of the four elements, the world of generation and corruption, into a single discipline.¹⁰⁹

We have pointed out the ambiguity found in several prominent Islamic encyclopedic reference sources regarding whether 'ilm al-hay'a (science of configuration) replaces 'ilm al-nujūm (science of the stars) as the general category for the discipline of astronomy, or whether it is relegated to a subdivision. Either way, the important point to keep in mind (reinforced by the works 'Atufi catalogues as hay'a) is that hay'a is recognized as a mathematical discipline of astronomy that provides an overview of cosmography, one highly influenced by Ptolemy's Almagest and Planetary Hypotheses. And hay'a basīṭa (simplified hay'a) is recognized as a branch of theoretical astronomy, one devoid of its geometrical proofs and complex mathematical derivations.¹¹⁰ Moreover, irrespective of their level of difficulty, most hay'a works follow a standard structure, which includes an introduction and a two-part division, one part dealing with the configuration of the celestial region (hay'at al-samā'), and another part devoted to topics related to the configuration of the Earth (hay'at al-arḍ). Some hay'a works also provide a chapter or section on the subject of celestial sizes and distances and/or a discussion of chronology.

In sum, hay'a works emphasize transforming mathematical models of celestial motion into physical bodies, and thus offer a picture of God's universe as a whole by focusing on the external aspects of cosmology, or issues related to "how" the celestial or terrestrial realms operate the way they do. Typically omitted are subjects dealing with "why" the celestial or terrestrial realms operate the way they do, i.e., the internal aspects of cosmology related to natural philosophy and Aristotelian metaphysics. In fact, Nasir al-Din al-Tusi explicitly states in his introduction to al-Tadhkira fī 'ilm al-hay'a that there is a demarcation of subject matter between the disciplines, and that the science of hay'a relies on principles "proved in another science and are taken for granted in this science."¹¹¹ A common exemplification of this point is that parameters for the various planetary motions are provided throughout hay'a works with the expectation that the reader knows to refer to the zīj literature as the reference source.

It is also significant that hay'a works tend to exclude topics on astrology, especially those espousing predictive capabilities related to future events.¹¹² Presumably, this dissociation of 'ilm al-hay'a from astrology contributed to hay'a works securing a niche within Islamic religious circles.¹¹³ For it is not atypical to find discussions on astronomy contained within "theological" works.¹¹⁴

So, given that hay'a forms the largest component of astral works in 'Atufi's inventory, and considering the ambiguity of what constitutes a hay'a work during this time and place, a closer look at the works categorized as hay'a will situate the hay'a of late fifteenth- to early sixteenth-century Istanbul within the broader tradition of Islamic theoretical astronomy.

The inventory clearly indicates that the Topkapı Palace library had come to possess a considerable corpus of recognized Islamic hay'a compositions under Bayezid II and his father Mehmed II. The vast majority of these were part of centuries-long traditions, bearing the standard two-part structure. On the other hand, a sizeable number are treatises dealing with aspects of Ptolemaic spherical astronomy and planetary theory intended to improve on Ptolemy, or at least make him more comprehensible. Among these are recensions (taḥārīr) or reworkings of Ptolemy's Almagest, which might contain original material within them, such as we find in Tusi's Taḥrīr al-Majisṭī (Recension of the Almagest). It exists in numerous copies in the inventory,¹¹⁵ along with several commentaries on it, including one by Nizam al-Din al-Nisaburi.¹¹⁶ Also included in the collection is a rare copy of Ibn al-Haytham's (d. ca. 1040) Sharḥ kitāb Majisṭī Baṭlamyūs fī al-hay'a (A Commentary on Ptolemy's Almagest),¹¹⁷ and a copy of his Ḥall shukūk fī kitāb al-Majisṭī (Solution of Difficulties in the Almagest), in which Ibn al-Haytham criticizes the irregularities and violations of uniform circular motion within the Almagest.¹¹⁸ In addition, one finds the twelfth-century Andalusian al-Bitruji's treatise in which he puts forth homocentric modeling as an alternative to Ptolemy's Almagest, a work that would have a major impact on theoretical astronomy in the Latin West. It is listed twice in the inventory as Kitāb 'ajīb fī al-hay'a (An Amazing Work on hay'a), an indication perhaps that the idea of a homocentric cosmology was relatively uncommon within an Islamic context, or was viewed as somewhat more unconventional.¹¹⁹

There are several formative hay'a compositions in 'Atufi's inventory that were authored between the mid-twelfth to early thirteenth centuries in the environs of Merv, under the auspices of the late Khwarazmshahs in Central Asia. 'Abd al-Jabbar al-Kharaqi (d. 1158) wrote his influential Muntahā al-idrak fī taqāsīm al-aflāk (The Utmost Attainment on the Structure of the Orbs) and the shorter al-Tabṣira fī 'ilm al-hay'a (Enlightenment on the Science of hay'a), both composed ca. 526–27/1132–33 in Arabic, as well as a Persian hay'a work entitled Umda li-ūlī al-albāb or ‘Umda Khwarazmshāhī (A Pillar for the Perspicacious, or The Khwarazmshah Pillar).¹²⁰ Among Kharaqī’s three hay’a works, the Muntahā is missing (as far as we know) from the inventory. Here one is tempted to assume that acquiring a copy of the work proved difficult, especially compared with the popularity of the Tabṣira, which also inspired a few commentaries (the Muntahā has none). Among them, the Sharḥ al-Tabṣira by Mubarakshah al-Bukhari (d. 1340) is listed in ‘Atufi’s inventory.¹²¹

Some seventy years later, in 602–3/1205–6, Mahmud al-Jaghmini composed al-Mulakhkhaṣ fī ‘ilm al-hay’a al-basīṭa (Epitome of Simplified hay’a), an introduction to Ptolemaic theoretical astronomy in Arabic. This elementary hay’a work, of which five copies are listed in the inventory, would play a significant role in the teaching, dissemination, and institutional instruction of Islamic theoretical astronomy well into the nineteenth century.¹²² The base Arabic text served as the starting point for at least sixty-two commentaries, supercommentaries, glosses, and translations (into Persian,¹²³ Turkish,¹²⁴ and Hebrew¹²⁵). From among these derivative works, ‘Atufi’s inventory lists those of ten authors we can identify.¹²⁶

A significant number of hay’a compositions in the inventory were written in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries throughout Central Asia and Anatolia. And it is worth emphasizing that many of the works associated with members of the so-called “Maragha School” of the thirteenth century were composed outside of Maragha.

‘Atufi’s inventory lists six hay’a works by Nasir al-Din al-Tusi (d. 1274). Four of these are hay’a basīṭa treatises: his Risāla-i Mu’īniyya (dedicated to Mu’in al-Din while Tusi was in the service of his father Nasir al-Din Muhtasham, the Isma‘ili governor of Quhistan, composed in 632/1235); its appendix, the Ḥall-i Mu’īniyya (sometimes, as here, called a commentary [sharḥ] on the work, composed in 643/1245);¹²⁷ an Arabic reworking of these two Persian works entitled al-Tadhkira fī ‘ilm al-hay’a (the Maragha version completed in 659/1261, the Baghdad version in 672/1274);¹²⁸ and Zubdat al-idrāk fī al-hay’a (The Essence of Understanding hay’a), a shorter version of the Tadhkira.¹²⁹ Tusi’s other two works include his aforementioned Tahrīr al-Majistī, a recension of the Almagest completed in 644/1247 after

Tusi relocated to Alamut,¹³⁰ and his Zubda-i hay’a (Essence of hay’a), a treatise in thirty chapters written in Persian for his students.¹³¹

‘Atufi’s inventory also includes several copies of Sharaf al-Din Muhammad ibn Mas‘udi’s (fl. thirteenth century) Kitāb-i Jahān-dānish (Book of Knowledge of the World), a Persian hay’a work with the two-part division.¹³² This is a translation by the author of his Arabic work entitled al-Kifāya fī ‘ilm hay’at al-‘ālam, but the Arabic work is not listed by ‘Atufi. Another apparent hay’a work is Mu‘ayyad al-Din al-Jajarami’s Persian work entitled Kitāb faṣṣ al-khātām fī hay’at al-‘ālam (Ring Stone on the Configuration of the World), which was dedicated to the Delhi sultan Qutb al-Din Aybak (Aybeg) (r. 1206–10).¹³³

There are four hay’a works listed for Qutb al-Din al-Shirazi (d. 1311). Three are his major Arabic compositions: the Nihāyat al-idrāk fī dirāyat al-aflāk (The Utmost Attainment in Comprehending the Orbs), completed 680/1281 in Sivas;¹³⁴ al-Tuḥfa al-shāhiyya (The Imperial Gift), dedicated to the vizier Amir Shah ibn Taj al-Din Mu‘tazz ibn Tahir, completed 684/1285 in Sivas;¹³⁵ and Fa’alta fa-lā talum (You’ve Done It So Don’t Blame [me]), a supercommentary on Tusi’s Tadhkira, completed sometime after 700/1300 in Tabriz.¹³⁶ The remaining hay’a work is Shirazi’s Persian Ikhtiyārāt-i Muẓaffarī (Selections for Muẓaffar al-Din Arslan), which was named after a local ruler in Kastamonu and completed in 680/1282, also in Sivas.¹³⁷

There are several other important hay’a works in Bayezid II’s library stemming from the fourteenth century. Among these are two commentaries by Nizam al-Din al-Nisaburi (d. 1329–30), one on Tusi’s Tahrīr al-Majistī (Recension of the Almagest), the other an elucidation of Tusi’s Tadhkira (Tawḍīḥ al-Tadhkira), composed in 711/1311;¹³⁸ and a Mulakhkhaṣ commentary by Yusuf ibn Mubarak al-Alani entitled Ṭurar al-Mulakhkhaṣ fī al-hay’a (Clippings of the Mulakhkhaṣ), composed in 735/1335 and dedicated to Jani Beg Khan (d. 1357), ruler of the Golden Horde of the Mongol Empire.¹³⁹ The inventory lists another Mulakhkhaṣ commentary by Kamal al-Din al-Turkmani (d. 1357), composed in 755/1354 in Gulistan and also offered to Jani Beg Khan;¹⁴⁰ and two commentaries by Fadl Allah al-‘Ubaydi (d. 1350), a student of Qutb al-Din al-Shirazi. The first is

Ubaydi's commentary on Tusi's Tadhkira, entitled Bayān al-Tadhkira wa-tibyān al-tabṣira (a play on Kharaqī's title), and the second is yet another Mulakhkhaṣ commentary in which 'Ubaydi tells us (in its preface) that he composed the work in three days at the request of professors and students.¹⁴¹

Three Islamic scholars in particular, who flourished between the mid-fourteenth and late fifteenth centuries in the regions of Anatolia and Central Asia, deserve special mention. The first is the renowned theologian al-Sayyid al-Sharīf al-Jurjani (d. 1413), who also composed hay'a commentaries on Tusi's Tadhkira, Shirazī's Tuhfa, and Jaghmini's Mulakhkhaṣ. However, only his Sharḥ al-Tadhkira (composed in 811/1409)¹⁴² and Sharḥ al-Mulakhkhaṣ are included in 'Atufi's inventory,¹⁴³ along with a unique anonymous Turkish translation of the latter.¹⁴⁴

Our second scholar of distinction is Qadizade al-Rumi (d. after 1440), who migrated from Bursa to Samarqand (Jurjani was one of his many teachers along the way to Transoxiana) and became the head-teacher of the Samarqand madrasa and the tutor of Sultan Ulugh Beg. In 1412, the year he arrived in Samarqand, Qadizade al-Rumi composed his Sharḥ al-Mulakhkhaṣ and presented it to Ulugh Beg, along with his geometrical tract Ashkāl al-ta'sīs (The Propositions for the Foundation). Qadizade's Sharḥ al-Mulakhkhaṣ was undoubtedly the most influential treatise of all the Mulakhkhaṣ commentaries, as evidenced by the extensive number of copies of this work, as well as the many glosses his Sharḥ al-Mulakhkhaṣ inspired.¹⁴⁵ It is noteworthy that the number of copies 'Atufi records for the Mulakhkhaṣ commentaries of Qadizade and Jurjani are more or less comparable in number. Nevertheless, of the seven listed glosses or supercommentaries (ḥāshiyas), only one is on Jurjani's Sharḥ. This is interesting since extant glosses on Jurjani's Sharḥ al-Mulakhkhaṣ are exceedingly rare.¹⁴⁶ In fact, the lion's share of extant ḥāshiyas are on Qadizade's Sharḥ, and, based on 'Atufi's inventory, we can identify the following authors who composed supercommentaries/glosses on this work. One gloss is by Fath Allah al-Shirwani (d. 1486), Qadizade's student at Samarqand, who also presented his work to Mehmed II in 878/1473. Shirwani also composed a Sharḥ al-Tadhkira in 879/1475, this after having already studied those of Nisaburi (composed 711/1311) and Jurjani (composed 811/1409).¹⁴⁷ Another Ḥāshiya 'alā Sharḥ al-Mulakhkhaṣ is by the aforementioned Sinan Pasha (d. 1486), the vizier and tutor of Mehmed II, who dedicated his gloss to Bayezid II.¹⁴⁸ Moreover, there are three copies of the gloss by Muhyi al-Din al-Niksari (d. 1495), a student of Shirwani, who also dedicated his treatise to Bayezid II.¹⁴⁹

'Ali Qushji (d. 1474) is the third prominent scholar who flourished during this time. As an active member of the Samarqand observatory, he was well acquainted with the views of his teacher Qadizade and Jurjani (as well as those of his predecessors and contemporaries), and was renowned for his scholarly contributions in a variety of disciplines. After migrating to Istanbul at Sultan Mehmed II's behest, he became, among other things, an intellectual pipeline between Samarqand and Istanbul. There are three hay'a works listed for Qushji in 'Atufi's inventory. The first is his Sharḥ al-Tuhfa al-shāhiyya, a commentary on Shirazī's Tuhfa.¹⁵⁰ The second is his Risālah dar 'ilm al-hay'a, a Persian teaching text composed in 862/1458 in Samarqand. The work was widely used and translated into Turkish and also Sanskrit. It, along with Tusi's Tadhkira, played an important role in transmitting Islamic astronomy to India.¹⁵¹ Qushji's third work, al-Faṭḥiyya fī 'ilm al-hay'a (The Conquest on the Science of hay'a), is a revised translation of the Risālah dar 'ilm al-hay'a, which he presented to Mehmed II in 873/1473. The work became a staple intermediate-level textbook in Ottoman schools,¹⁵² and 'Atufi listed a copy of the commentary on it by Qushji's student Ghulam Sinan (d. 1506), entitled Faṭḥ al-faṭḥiyya fī sharḥ al-Faṭḥiyya (The Opening of the Conquest in Commenting on the Faṭḥiyya).¹⁵³

At least three works dealing with trigonometry are listed under one of the hay'a classifications. These include Husam al-Din 'Ali ibn Fadl Allah al-Salar's (fl. ca. mid-eleventh century) Kitāb jāmi' al-qawānīn 'alā 'ilm al-hay'a (Book Comprising the Rules of the Science of hay'a);¹⁵⁴ Thabit ibn Qurra's (d. 901) Fī al-shakl al-mulaqqab bi-al-qāṭṭā' min kitāb al-Majisṭī (On the Figure Called the Secant from the Almagest);¹⁵⁵ and an anonymous commentary on Thabit's treatise.¹⁵⁶ almost all works on hay'a under either hay'a or 'ilm al-hay'a. For details, see the chart at the end of this essay.

There are a number of anonymous works that we cannot currently identify.¹⁵⁷ Generally speaking, 'Atufi lists

We can make several general comments about the palace library's hay'a collection based on 'Atufi's inventory. First, though the majority of hay'a works were composed in Arabic, a sizeable number of treatises (some 16 percent) were composed in or translated into Persian.¹⁵⁸ Also striking is that Bayezid II and his father were not content to acquire a single copy of a work, as evidenced by multiple exemplars of many compositions (this applies whether the work was an original base text [matn], commentary [sharḥ], or gloss [ḥāshiya]).¹⁵⁹ Moreover, there are numerous examples of a single author composing multiple hay'a commentaries. For example, 'Ubaydi, Jurjani, and Shirwani all composed commentaries on both Tusi's Tadhkira and Jaghmini's Mulakhkhaṣ. Furthermore, there seems to have been a concerted effort to obtain multiple commentaries on and translations of a work. This all indicates that the two sultans under whom the palace library collection was amassed were keen on acquiring a corpus of hay'a works that put forth a variety of ideas. Consequently, users of the palace library had access to a variety of perspectives, e.g., 'Ubaydi's Bayān al-Tadhkira, Nisaburi's Tawḍīḥ al-Tadhkira, Jurjani's Sharḥ al-Tadhkira, Shirwani's Sharḥ al-Tadhkira, and so on.¹⁶⁰ 'Atufi's inventory of hay'a works, then, underscores the point that Islamic rulers and scholars in their entourage were actively engaged in acquiring and studying hay'a works up to their own time, further evidence that the post-classical period of scientific achievement was far from stagnant within Islamic lands. It is unlikely that even an astute astrologer working in Bayezid II's court would have been able to foresee the continuous impact and influence that hay'a works would have in the Islamic world for many centuries to come.

ARITHMETIC

'Atufi's inventory uses ḥisāb (arithmetic) and 'ilm al-ḥisāb (the science of arithmetic) to designate treatises on arithmetic. These works encompass subjects ranging from basic arithmetic operations and algebra to number theory, combinatorics, and analysis. In addition, arithmetical/algebraic works had practical applications for calculation in daily business affairs and matters related to inheritance law (farā'id). The history of the genre goes back to the translation movement in the ninth century, when the earliest known Islamic works on arithmetic were written by Muhammad ibn Musa al-Khwarazmi (fl. ca. 820). A significant feature of the early Islamic works on arithmetic is the fusion of Indian and Greek traditions that would begin a newly formulated tradition of arithmetic.¹⁶¹

Pre-thirteenth-century works on arithmetic in 'Atufi's inventory include the relevant parts contained within Ibn Sina's encyclopedic works: his Kitāb al-shifā' (The Book of Healing); al-Najāh (Salvation); and Dānishnāma-yi 'Alā'ī (The 'Ala'ī Encyclopedia).¹⁶² There is also a handbook of arithmetic for government bureaucrats by Abu Bakr al-Karaji (fl. ca. 1000) entitled al-Kāfi fī 'ilm al-ḥisāb (The Sufficient on the Science of Arithmetic), and a commentary on it by Abu Bakr 'Abd Allah al-Husayn al-Shaqqāq al-Baghdadi (d. 1117).¹⁶³ Two important works on arithmetic by Karaji are absent (al-Fakhrī and al-Badī' fī al-ḥisāb [The Innovative in Arithmetic]), but fragments of the latter work are preserved in Samaw'al ibn Yahya ibn 'Abbas al-Maghribi's (d. 1174–75) al-Bāhir fī 'ilm al-ḥisāb (The Brilliant in the Science of Arithmetic), a work in Bayezid II's collection.¹⁶⁴ Also listed in 'Atufi's inventory is Miftāḥ al-mu'āmalāt (The Key to [business] Transactions) by Abu Ja'far Muhammad ibn Ayyub al-Tabari (fl. eleventh century), a Persian work written for craftsmen;¹⁶⁵ and Siraj al-Din Abu Tahir Muhammad ibn 'Abd al-Rashid al-Sajawandi's Risāla fī al-ḥisāb.¹⁶⁶ A commentary on Sajawandi's al-Tajnīs fī al-ḥisāb (Congeniality on Arithmetic) by Fanarizade 'Ali Çelebi (d. 1497) is also in the inventory.¹⁶⁷

The majority of arithmetic works in the inventory were written between the thirteenth and fifteenth centuries. In the thirteenth century, Nasir al-Din al-Tusi composed Jawāmi' al-ḥisāb bi-al-takht wa-al-turāb (Comprehensive Arithmetic on Using the Dust Board).¹⁶⁸ He also wrote a work on algebra, a copy of which was in Bayezid II's library.¹⁶⁹ At about the same time, 'Izz al-Din 'Abd al-Wahhab al-Zanjani (fl. ca. 1262), at whose request Tusi wrote his al-Tadhkira fī 'ilm al-hay'a (Memoir on Astronomy), composed several works on arithmetic.¹⁷⁰ Three of these are listed by 'Atufi: Umdat al-ḥisāb (Pillar of Arithmetic);¹⁷¹ Qusṭās al-mu'ādala fī 'ilm al-jabr wa-al-muqābala (The Scale of Equality on the Science of Algebra);¹⁷² and Risāla kāfiya fī al-ḥisāb (The Sufficient Treatise on Arithmetic).¹⁷³

In 657/1259, Ibn Khawwam al-Baghdadi (d. 1328), who studied with Tusi, composed al-Fawā'id al-bahā'iyya fī al-qawā'id al-ḥisābiyya (The Baha'i Scholia on Rules of Arithmetic).¹⁷⁴ Included in Bayezid II's library, this book, which mainly deals with techniques of mental calculation, was the basis of a commentary tradition. Ibn Khawwam's pupil, Kamal al-Din al-Farisi (d. 1319), wrote a commentary on it entitled Asās al-qawā'id fī uṣūl al-Fawā'id (The Basis of the Rules regarding the Principles of the Fawā'id), of which the inventory lists four copies.¹⁷⁵ The library moreover had copies of an anonymous commentary entitled Sharḥ bahā'iyya fī al-ḥisāb (Commentary on the Baha'i Arithmetic)¹⁷⁶ and 'Imad al-Din Yahya ibn Ahmad al-Kashi's (fl. ca. 1343) commentary on Ibn Khawwam's work called Īdāḥ al-maqāsid fī sharḥ al-Fawā'id (Elucidation of Goals in Commenting on the Fawā'id).¹⁷⁷ 'Atufi also lists Kashi's work on arithmetic written in 1343 in Isfahan, entitled Lubāb fī al-ḥisāb (Quintessence on Arithmetic).¹⁷⁸

In the last two decades of his life, Qutb al-Din al-Shirazi (d. 1311) settled in Tabriz, a city that attracted scholars from many regions. A number of scholars in Shirazi's circle, including the above-mentioned Kamal al-Din Farisi, wrote treatises on arithmetic. Shirazi himself included a section on arithmetic in his Durrat al-tāj (The Pearl of the Crown) but it is not clear whether any of the copies of this extensive work in Bayezid II's library contained that section.¹⁷⁹ Another scholar in Shirazi's circle was Jamal al-Din Sa'id ibn Muhammad al-Turkistani (fl. ca. 1300), who composed al-Risāla al-'Alā'iyya fī al-masā'il al-ḥisābiyya (The 'Alā'iyya Treatise on Arithmetic Problems), of which four copies appear in the inventory.¹⁸⁰ Also included in Bayezid's library was Jalal al-Din 'Ali ibn al-Gharbi's (fl. ca. 1350) commentary on Turkistani's book called al-Mu'jizāt al-Najībiyya fī sharḥ al-risāla al-'Alā'iyya fī al-ḥisāb (Najībiyya Miracles in Commenting on the 'Alā'iyya Treatise on Arithmetic), which was dedicated to Najib al-Din Muhammad ibn Shams al-Din Husayn al-Damghani (fl. ca. 1350).¹⁸¹

posed an influential and widely disseminated work on arithmetic, al-Risāla al-Shamsiyya (The Shamsiyya Treatise), of which five manuscripts existed in the palace library.¹⁸² Among the entries in 'Atufi's inventory, those related to al-Shamsiyya are: a Persian translation by Mahmud ibn Muhammad ibn Mahmud al-Shirazi (fl. ca. 1450);¹⁸³ an Arabic commentary by Qushji's student Abu Ishaq al-Kirmani (fl. fifteenth century);¹⁸⁴ and another commentary in Persian.¹⁸⁵

Moving westward, in the library collection we find al-Risāla al-'Imādiyya fī al-ṭuruq al-ḥisābiyya (The Imādiyya Treatise on Arithmetic Methods) by a certain al-Kashghari who composed the work around 1310 in Baghdad.¹⁸⁶ From Egypt, there is the Ghunyat al-ḥussāb (The Wealth of the Arithmeticians) by Qadi al-Humamiyya (d. 1272).¹⁸⁷

'Atufi's inventory lists works in arithmetic by several scholars who flourished in the late fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Among these is Ghiyath al-Din Jamshid al-Kashi's (d. 1429) Miftāḥ al-ḥisāb (The Key to Arithmetic), a comprehensive and influential encyclopedic book in the field.¹⁸⁸ Later in the fifteenth century, 'Ali Qushji dedicated his al-Risāla al-Muḥammadiyya fī al-ḥisāb (The Muḥammadiyya Treatise on Arithmetic) to Mehmed II.¹⁸⁹ From this period, 'Atufi lists Mukhtaṣar al-Ṣalāḥī fī al-ḥisāb, which has been attributed to Salah al-Din Musa ibn Muhammad ibn Mahmud al-Rumi (known as Qadizade al-Rumi). However, this authorship has been contested by İhsan Fazlıoğlu, who has attributed the work to a certain Salah al-Din Musa who lived before Qadizade.¹⁹⁰ Interestingly, 'Atufi lists three copies of one or more commentaries. In one of the extant codices, an attribution is made to a certain Shams al-Din Muhammad al-Khatibi.¹⁹¹

Although most arithmetic works, both in 'Atufi's inventory and otherwise, were in Arabic, there are several Persian listings. We have already noted the early work by al-Tabari. Also included in the inventory is Muhammad ibn 'Abd al-Karim al-Ghaznawi's Tuḥfat al-ṣudūr (Gift from the Hearts), probably composed in thirteenth-century Central Asia.¹⁹² Another Persian work in the library holdings was by Mahmud al-Hirawi al-Walishtani (fl. ca. 1445), who was based at the court of Shahrūkh ibn Timur in Herat.¹⁹³ Additionally, Khayr al-Din Khalil ibn Ibrahim (late fifteenth century) wrote a Persian work on arithmetic entitled Mushkil-gushā-yi ḥussāb (Problem Solver for Arithmeticians), dedicated to Bayezid II.¹⁹⁴ Four other anonymous Persian arithmetic works are listed by ‘Atufi, one of which has a copy dated 861/1456–57.¹⁹⁵

‘Atufi mentions several other works on arithmetic, not all of which can be definitively identified:

1. Kitāb al-kifāya fī ‘ilm al-ḥisāb (Book of Sufficiency in Arithmetic);¹⁹⁶
2. Kitāb jāmi‘ uṣūl al-ḥisāb (Compendium of Principles of Arithmetic);¹⁹⁷
3. Kitāb al-mi‘a wa-al-‘ishrīn fī ḥisāb al-ḍarb (Book of the One Hundred and Twenty in Arithmetic Multiplication);¹⁹⁸
4. Iqnā‘ fī al-misāḥa (Persuasive Argument concerning Surveying);¹⁹⁹
5. Risāla Najm al-Milla wa-al-Dīn fī al-ḥisāb al-hawā’ī (Treatise by Najm al-Din on Mental Arithmetic);²⁰⁰
6. Risāla al-‘adad bi-awḍā‘ al-aṣābi‘ (Treatise on Counting by Finger Reckoning);²⁰¹
7. Risāla fārisiyya fī al-siyāqa (Persian Treatise on Accounting Arithmetic);²⁰²
8. Risāla fī ma‘rifat al-ḥisāb al-hindi (Treatise on Understanding Indian Arithmetic);²⁰³
9. Works simply listed as fī al-ḥisāb or fī ‘ilm al-ḥisāb.²⁰⁴

GEOMETRY

‘Atufi generally uses the term fī al-handasa (on geometry) to designate geometrical treatises in the inventory. But as with nujūm and hay’a, he occasionally uses other phrasing, including fī al-handasiyyāt (on geometries) and min qibal al-handasa (pertaining to geometry).

A substantial number of works under handasa are related to Euclid’s Elements, originally composed ca. 300 BCE.²⁰⁵ As far as we can tell, ‘Atufi’s list does not include any of the original ninth-century translations made from the Greek into Arabic. On the other hand, he does record a number of derivative works that were meant to be abridgements, reworkings, or commentaries. These include ‘Alī ibn Ahmad al-Nasawi’s (fl. eleventh century) al-Tajrīd fī uṣūl al-handasa (Abridgement of the Elements of Geometry), comprising a selection of propositions from Euclid’s Elements;²⁰⁶ and Nasir al-Din al-Tusi’s Tahrīr uṣūl Uqlīdis (Recension of Euclid’s Elements), completed in 1248. The latter supplanted the original and was widely disseminated and taught in Islamic lands until the twentieth century.²⁰⁷ Also listed is Shams al-Din al-Samarqandi’s (d. ca. 1322) Ashkāl al-ta’sīs (The Propositions for the Foundation), a selection of propositions from Euclid’s Elements destined to become quite influential.²⁰⁸ Samarqandi’s work was the subject of numerous commentaries and supercommentaries; the most famous one by Qadizade al-Rumi is in ‘Atufi’s inventory, as is its supercommentary by Qutb al-Din Çelebi (fl. late fifteenth century).²⁰⁹ The palace library holdings included summaries of the Elements (and of other mathematical sciences) that appear in encyclopedic works, such as Ibn Sina’s (d. 1037) Kitāb al-shifā’ (The Book of Healing), al-Najāh (Salvation), and Dānishnāma-yi ‘Alā’ī (‘Alā’ī Encyclopedia). In the late thirteenth century, Qutb al-Din al-Shirazi incorporated a Persian recension of the Elements, based on Tusi’s earlier Tahrīr, in the mathematical part of his encyclopedic Durrat al-tāj li-ghurra al-Dabbāj (The Pearl of the Crown for the Eminent of the Dabbāj Family), a work listed in the inventory.²¹⁰

In addition to recensions, commentaries, summaries, and abridgements, individual parts of the Elements were subject to study, analysis, and criticism. One case involved the postulates of Book I and, in particular, Postulate 5, which dealt with parallel lines; this became a focus of criticism by a number of Islamic mathematicians who held that it should not be a postulate but a provable theorem.²¹¹ Works in Bayezid II’s library discussing this problem include Ibn al-Haytham’s Sharḥ muṣādarāt kitāb Uqlīdis (Commentary on the Postulates of Euclid’s Book) and Nasir al-Din al-Tusi’s al-Risāla al-shāfiya ‘an shakk fī al-khuṭūṭ al-mutawāziya (The Treatise that Heals Doubt about Parallel Lines).²¹² The tenth book of the Elements was also the subject of a commentary tradition. One of these commentaries is Abu Ja‘far al-Khazin’s (d. ca. 960) Tafsīr ṣadr al-maqāla al-‘āshira min kitāb Uqlīdis (Explication of the Beginning of Book X of Euclid’s Work).²¹³ Another example is Abu al-Hasan al-Ahwazi’s (fl. ca. 1000) Sharḥ al-maqāla al-‘āshira min kitāb Uqlīdis (Commentary on Book X of Euclid’s Work).²¹⁴ Al-‘Abbas al-Jawhari’s (fl. 830) Ziyādāt fī al-maqāla al-khāmisa min kitāb Uqlidis (Additions to Book V of Euclid’s Work) is an example of a work written on another part of Euclid’s Elements that was in Bayezid II’s collection.²¹⁵ The collection also had an anonymous Kitāb da‘āwā Uqlidis (Claims Made by Euclid).²¹⁶

In addition to the tradition of Euclid’s Elements, there are other geometrical works in ‘Atufi’s inventory. Apollonius of Perga (fl. second half of third century BCE) compiled a work on conic sections that represented one of the high points in Greek geometry. The Conics is in eight parts, only the first four of which survive in the original Greek. Seven of the eight parts were translated in the ninth century by a group led by the Banu Musa, and ‘Atufi lists three or four copies of this translation.²¹⁷ Two works derivative of the Conics found their way into Bayezid II’s collection: Abu al-Fath al-Isfahani’s (fl. ca. 1120) Talkhīṣ al-Makhrūṭāt (Abridgement of the Conics)²¹⁸ and ‘Abd al-Malik al-Shirazi’s Taṣaffuḥ al-Makhrūṭāt (Examining the Conics).²¹⁹

Other geometrical works in Bayezid II’s collection include Abu al-Wafa’ al-Buzjani’s (d. ca. 997) Fīmā yuḥtāj ilayhi min a‘māl al-handasa (On What Is Required of Geometric Operations);²²⁰ Risāla al-birkār al-tāmm (Treatise on the Perfect Compass);²²¹ an anonymous Kitāb al-uṣūl al-aṣliyya fī al-handasa (Book on the Fundamental Principles in Geometry);²²² geometrical treatises by a certain Abu al-Futuh (probably Najm al-Din Ahmad ibn al-Sari [d. 1154]);²²³ Qutb al-Din al-Shirazi’s Sharḥ al-risāla ‘alā al-ḥaraka al-daḥraja, a work dealing with straight and curved angles;²²⁴ Thabit ibn Qurra’s (d. 901) Kitāb fī al-nisba al-mu‘allafa (On Compound Ratios);²²⁵ and various codices of unspecified geometrical content.²²⁶ Oddly, ‘Atufi refers to one copy of al-Sufi’s book on constellations as “pertaining to geometry.”²²⁷

In a number of cases, ‘Atufi mentions an unspecified collection of treatises dealing with geometry.²²⁸ A subset of these are designated as the “middle books” (mutawassiṭāt), which were meant to be studied after Euclid’s Elements and before undertaking Ptolemy’s Almagest.²²⁹ A good example is entry [572], currently TSMK, A. 3453 (Karatay: A 7005), a remarkable codex that, in addition to Tusi’s recension of the “middle books,” also contains his recensions of the Elements and the Almagest, as well as an important copy of his al-Tadhkira fī ‘ilm al-hay’a.

MUSIC

The practice of music and music theory always coexisted and interacted in pre-modern Islamic works on music. Theoretical works began quite early, but there are periods during which such works are missing from the extant manuscript witnesses.

Among the earliest works in the inventory is one by Abu Talib al-Mufaddal ibn Salama (d. ca. 903) entitled Kitāb al-malāhī wa-asmā’ihā (Book of Musical Instruments and Their Names).²³⁰ Somewhat surprisingly, works by Abu Nasr al-Farabi and Ibn Sina are missing. After Ibn Salama, the next listed work is Safi al-Din al-Urmawi’s (d. 1294) al-Mukhtaṣar fī ma‘rifat al-nagh(a)m/nigham wa-al-adwār (Epitome on Understanding Musical Tunes and Modes [better known as Kitāb al-adwār, Book of the Modes]), composed in Arabic ca. 1236).²³¹ After Urmawi, we can trace a continuous tradition that lasted up to the time of Bayezid II reflected in the inventory.

Urmawi was the major figure in theoretical music in the thirteenth century. At a young age, he began his service at Abbasid courts in Baghdad; after the fall of the caliphate in 1258, he continued his official service under the Ilkhanids. Kitāb al-adwār belongs to his earlier period in Baghdad. Because Urmawi cites no sources for material that seems to be absent in earlier sources, it is difficult to judge the degree of originality of this influential work. During his later Ilkhanid service, around 1267, he wrote al-Risāla al-Sharafiyya fī al-nisab al-ta’līfiyya (The Sharafiyya Treatise on Musical Proportions), dedicated to Sharaf al-Din Harun al-Juwayni (d. 1286), of which three copies appear in the inventory.²³² Since he quotes Farabi’s work on music in this later work, we may assume that he had access to it at the extensive library in the Mongol capital at Maragha. Because Urmawi’s two works are the basis of commentaries and translations, he became an authority in the field of music for several centuries. For example, Qutb al-Din al-Shirazi used al-Sharafiyya in the section on music in his encyclopedia Durrat al-tāj, which can be considered a critical commentary on Urmawi's Sharafīyya.

After Shirazi, Urmawi's tradition continued in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries.²³³ It is during this time that 'Abd al-Qadir al-Maraghi (d. 1435) composed several important works in Persian on music theory, of which 'Atufi included five in his inventory: Maraghi's principal work Jāmi' al-alḥān (Compendium of Melodies), composed in 818/1415;²³⁴ its abridgement Maqāṣid al-alḥān (Meaning of Melodies), composed in 821/1418;²³⁵ a commentary on Urmawi's al-Adwār;²³⁶ a collection of notes written after his commentary called Fawā'id 'ashara (Ten Scholia);²³⁷ and a work entitled Risāla Lahniyya (Treatise on Melodies).²³⁸ In addition, there is a work listed as Kitāb 'Abd al-Qādir al-Marāghī fī al-mūsīqī (Maraghi's Book on Music) that may be one of the other works listed.²³⁹

Both Maraghi's son and grandson continued serving Ottoman rulers, and 'Atufi's inventory includes a work on music by Maraghi's son, 'Abd al-'Aziz ibn 'Abd al-Qadir, dedicated to Mehmed II and entitled Naqāwat al-adwār (Best of the Modes).²⁴⁰ 'Abd al-'Aziz's son, Mahmud, served Bayezid II and wrote a Maqāṣid al-adwār (The Meaning of Modes) in 1503. He later dedicated the same work to Selim I (r. 1512–20).²⁴¹

Another prominent scholar who contributed to the field of music in the fifteenth century was Fath Allah al-Shirwani, who dedicated his Majalla fī al-mūsīqī (Codex on Music) to Mehmed II in 1453.²⁴² Two copies of this work were in the library, as was his Persian translation of Urmawi's al-Adwār (see endnote 231).

Muhammad ibn 'Abd al-Hamid al-Ladhiqi (fl. ca. 1483) was among the musicians of Bayezid II's court. He dedicated two treatises on music to this sultan: al-Risāla al-Faṭḥiyya (The Faṭḥiyya Treatise) and Zayn al-alḥān fī 'ilm al-ta'līf wa-al-awzān (The Adornment of Melodies on the Science of [musical] Composition and Meters).²⁴³

and Risāla fārisiyya manzūma fī ḥikāya mūsīqiyya (Persian Treatise in Verse on a Musical Narrative).²⁴⁷ There are also works given only generic titles.²⁴⁸

 10. Both Khwārazmī and the Ikhwān explicitly equate the Greek term astronomia with ‘ilm al-nujūm.
 11. Fārābī is quite clear on this, since he calls the sub-branch ‘ilm al-nujūm al-ta’līmī.

 15. An interesting discussion of this is found in ‘Abd al-‘Alī al-Bīrjandī’s (fl. 1507) gloss on Qāḍizāde’s commentary on Jāghmīnī’s al-Mulakhkhaṣṣ fi al-hay’a al-basīṭa (Ragep, Naşir al-Dīn al-Ṭūsī’s Memoir, 1:39).

 18. Ṭāshkubrīzāde, Miftāḥ al-sa’āda, 1:357–61. Şen, “Astrology in the Service of the Empire,” 70–72, points to Ṭāshkubrīzāde’s skepticism regarding aḥkām’s scientific basis, but fails to note what he says about it being unsound (madkhūla) legally. Şen does point out that Ṭāshkubrīzāde is critical of Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyya (d. 1350) for being overly derogatory regarding astrology, but it is not clear if he is objecting to the tone or something substantive.
 19. Ṭāshkubrīzāde, Miftāḥ al-sa’āda, 1:357–67.
 20. Ibid., 1:335–39.
 21. For a different interpretation, see Şen, “Astrology in the Service of the Empire,” 70–71. To bolster his case, Şen might have noted that Ṭāshkubrīzāde states regarding one subdivision of aḥkām, i.e., “elections” (ikhtiyārāt), that “the benefit of this science is clear, as is obvious to everyone” (Ṭāshkubrīzāde, Miftāḥ al-sa’āda, 1:336).

 26. Ḥājī Khalifa, Kashf al-zunūn, 2: col. 2047. Perhaps Kātib Çelebi is reflecting a burgeoning interest in Suyūṭī’s hay’a as reflected in the commentary by Ibrāhīm al-Karamānī (fl. 1654) that was presented to Sultan Mehmed IV (r. 1648–87), for which there are more than fifty extant copies. See Ekmeleddin İhsanoğlu et al., Osmanlı Astronomi Literatürü Tarihi (History of astronomy literature during the Ottoman period), 2 vols. (Istanbul, 1997), 1:288–90 (no. 153.1).

 28. We should note, however, that Kātib Çelebi did study with a number of prominent religious teachers and scholars, including the well-known Qaḍizāde Meḥmed Efendi (d. 1635): <https://ottomanhistorians.uchicago.edu/en/historian/katib-celebi> (accessed May 7, 2018). For a somewhat different view of Kātib Çelebi, one emphasizing his distance from the traditional educational system, see the recent online article by Prof. Bekir Karlığa, “The Horizon of Katip Çelebi’s Thought”: http://muslimheritage.com/article/horizon-katip-celebi%E2%80%99s-thought#sec_60 (accessed May 7, 2018).
 29. On Sīnān Pasha’s opposition to astrology and the astrologers, see Şen, “Astrology in the Service of the Empire,” 94–98. The ḥāshiya (gloss) on Qaḍizāde’s commentary is extant in several copies, e.g., SK, Carullah 1465; the introductory section is well worth a careful study. Sīnān Pasha apparently also wrote a ḥāshiya on Quṭb al-Dīn al-Shīrāzī’s large hay’a work, Nihāyat al-idrāk; for Sīnān’s work in astronomy, see Osmanlı Astronomi, 1:45–48 (no. 17).

 33. These twenty-one are the major classifications of aḥkām al-nujūm, nujūm, hay’a, ḥisāb, handasa, and musiqī. There are other lesser classifications (listed in the chart) that are used exceptionally or to indicate mixed categories.
 34. There is also a story that the inventor of chess asked to be rewarded with grains of wheat equivalent to the amount that would result from starting with one grain on the first square and then doubling the amount for each square until the sixty-fourth square was reached. Attempting to calculate the astonishing total ($2^{64}-1$) led to an interesting problem (called the “chess-board problem”) in combinatorics; see EL2, s.v. “Shāṭrandīj,” by Franz Rosenthal.

 38. See the chart at the end of this essay. By relying solely upon the inventory, without examining the codices themselves listed in it, it is hardly possible to reach a definitive conclusion regarding the genres of each and every work in the inventory, as many titles are generic. Therefore, this number should be considered a best estimate based upon our current knowledge.
 39. For these works, see A. Tunç Şen and Cornell H. Fleischer's list of entries at the end of their essay in this volume.
 40. See the chart at the end of this essay.
 41. The one example is [206].
 42. For more details on this category, see El2, s.v. "Ikhtiyārāt," by T. Fahd.
 43. See A. Tunç Şen and Cornell H. Fleischer, "Books on Astrology, Astronomical Tables, and Almanacs in the Library Inventory of Bayezid II," in this volume.
 44. These are [52] and [194] for Mehmed II, and [196] for Prince Cem. Interestingly, the horoscope for Sultan Bayezid II ([197]) is catalogued under Kutub al-tafāsīr wa-kutub 'ilm al-qirā'a.
 45. [82], [83], [84], [85], [87]/[160], [88]/[161], [89]/[162] are classified under aḥkām al-nujūm. [86]/[159] is under al-nujūm. The same issue is also pointed out by Şen and Fleischer in their article in this volume. Two additional copies ([81] and [90]/[163]) are catalogued under Kutub al-siyar wa-al-tawārikh.
 46. Şen and Fleischer's observation on 'Atufi's categories is as follows: "In general, however, 'Atufi seems to follow a discernible blueprint, cataloging all the *zīj*es and many of the textbooks of an astrological nature under the tags 'ilm al-nujūm or nujūm, and the majority of treatises on instruments of observation under min qibal al-nujūm" (Şen and Fleischer, "Books on Astrology" in this volume). However, one needs to be cautious here inasmuch as a number of works on instruments (at least sixteen titles) are listed under the nujūm category. (See our chart.)
 47. In recent years, some scholars have used "astronomical handbook with tables" as a definition for *zīj*es. In the Latin tradition, we find the term tabula in the title of many works related to *zīj*es. For simplicity, we will use "table" to translate zīj in the titles of works.
 48. On *zīj*es, see El2, s.v. "Zīj," by F. C. De Blois, D. A. King, and J. Samsó; Edward S. Kennedy, "A Survey of Islamic Astronomical Tables," Transactions of the American Philosophical Society, n.s., 46, no. 2 (1956): 123–77; and David A. King, Julio Samsó, and Bernard R. Goldstein, "Astronomical Handbooks and Tables from the Islamic World (750-1900): An Interim Report," Suḥayl 2 (2001): 9–105.
 49. There are a few unidentified works recorded by 'Atufi that may (or may not) fall within this time span, e.g., one copy of a Kitāb Zīj [191]; a collection of tables, the first of which is entitled Jadval-i ṭab'-hāyi burj-hā (Table of the Qualities of the Zodiacal Signs [232]); and one copy of a work listed as Kitāb jadāwīl al-tawārikh wa-al-nujūm (Book of Tables of Chronology and Astronomy [lit. "stars"] [239]).
 50. Five copies of Ṭūsī's Zīj-i Ilkhānī are recorded by 'Atufi as [164], [165] (currently TSMK, A. 3513 [Karatay: F 231]), [166], [167], [168]. In addition to A. 3513, codices with Bayezid II's seal occur in TSMK, A. 3502 (Karatay: F 230), Bursa Türk ve İslam Eserleri Müzesi 11, and Istanbul University F. 1418.
 51. For more on al-Maghribī, known as Ibn Abī al-Shukr, see Mercè Comes, "Ibn Abī al-Shukr: Muḥyī al-Milla wa-'l-Dīn Yahyā Abū 'Abdallāh ibn Muḥammad ibn Abī al-Shukr al-Maghribī al-Andalusī [Al-Qurṭubī]," in The Biographical Encyclopedia of Astronomers, ed. Thomas Hockey et al. (New York: Springer-Verlag, 2007), 548–49.
 52. As far as we know, Bukhārī's Umda-i Ilkhāniyya is not recorded by 'Atufi.
 53. Five copies of Nisābūrī's Kashf are recorded by 'Atufi as [76]/[172], [77]/[173], [78]/[174], [79]/[175], [80]/[176]. Copies of this work with Bayezid II's seal impressions are SK, Ayasofya 2696 and TSMK, A. 3510 (Karatay: F 232).
 54. An unidentified Sharḥ-i Zīj-i Ilkhānī (Commentary on the Ilkhani Tables) is recorded by 'Atufi as [169].
 55. On criticisms of Zīj-i Ilkhānī, see Fateme Savadi and Sajjad Nikfahm-Khubravan, "Harakat-i wasaṭ-i kawākib dar Zīj-i Ilkhānī wa naqd-hā-yi wārid bar ān" (The mean motion of the planets in Zīj-i Ilkhānī and the criticisms regarding it), in Ustād-i bashar, pājuhish-hā-yi dar zindigī, rūzīgār, falsafa wa 'ilm Khwāja Naṣīr al-Dīn Ṭūsī, ed. H. Masoumi Hamedani and M. Javad Anvari (Tehran: Miras-i Maktūb, 2012), 363–470.
 56. Two copies of Kāshī's Zīj are recorded by 'Atufi as [44]/[170] and [45]/[171]. One of these is SK, Ayasofya 2692.
 57. Five copies of Ulugh Beg's zīj are recorded by 'Atufi as [178], [179], [180], [181], [182]. One of these is SK, Hamidiye 844.
 58. Both of Bukhārī's two sets of tables are in [23].
 59. Two copies of al-Qūshjī's Sharḥ-i Zīj-i Ulugh Beg are [112]/[183] and [113]/[184]. One of these is TSMK, A. 3318 (no catalogue entry in Karatay).
 60. One copy of Mīrim Çelebī's Sharḥ-i Zīj-i Ulugh Beg, better known as Dustūr al-'amal fī taṣḥīḥ al-jadwal, is [74]/[185]. This is SK, Ayasofya 2697.
 61. For more on Khīṭabī, known as Khīṭabī Munajjim al-Ḥusaynī, see Ahmet Tunç Şen, "Reading the Stars at the Ottoman Court: Bāyezid II (r. 886/1481–918/1512) and His Celestial Interests," Arabica 64 (2017): 557–608, at 577–82. A copy of Khīṭabī's Tashriḥ al-ālāt is [51]. This may be the manuscript currently in Tehran, Majlis Shūrā MS 6376, which has Bayezid II's seal.
 62. A copy of Khalilī's al-Jadwal al-āfāqī is [47], currently TSMK, A. 3500 (Karatay: A 7120). Based on extant manuscript

- evidence, it is likely that Qunawī's Turkish translation or recension of this work may be found in [48]/[98], [49]/[100] (TSMK, A. 3499 [Karatay: T 1618]), and [50]/[99]. (According to Şen and Fleischer, [48]/[98] is currently SK, Ayasofya 2590.) See David A. King, "Astronomical Timekeeping in Ottoman Turkey," in Proceedings of the International Symposium on the Observatories in Islam, 19-23 Sept., 1977 (Istanbul: Milli Eğitim Basımevi, 1980), 245–69, at 247–48.
63. This is entry [24].
 64. See Tehran, Majlis Shūrā MS 3422, fol. 9b; Paris, BnF, MS arabe 2529, fol. 1b.
 65. Entry [69], currently TSMK, R. 1713 (Karatay: A 7126). See Osmanlı Astronomi, 1:57 (no. 24).
 66. A copy of Kūshyār ibn Labbān's al-Zīj al-jāmi' is recorded by 'Atufi as [65]. This is SK, Fatih 3418.
 67. Two copies of Bīrūnī's al-Qānūn al-Mas'ūdī is recorded by 'Atufi as [15] and [16].
 68. Ptolemy's Planisphaerium (Fī tasṭīḥ basīṭ al-kura) is currently contained in SK, Ayasofya 2671; our presumption is that this is the codex 'Atufi refers to for entries [66] and [231]. For the facsimile edition of this copy and an English translation, see Christopher Anagnostakis, "The Arabic Version of Ptolemy's Planisphaerium" (PhD diss., Yale University, 1984). For the critical edition of Ptolemy's Planisphaerium (based on SK, Ayasofya 2671 and another copy from Khān Malik Sāsānī's collection in Tehran), see Nathan Sidoli and J. L. Berggren, "The Arabic Version of Ptolemy's Planisphere or Flattening the Surface of the Sphere: Text, Translation, Commentary," Sciamvs 8 (2007): 37–139.
 69. Ustūrlābī's work is [7].
 70. See Richard Lorch, Al-Farghānī On the Astrolabe: Arabic Text Edited with Translation and Commentary (Stuttgart: Franz Steiner Verlag, 2005).
 71. A copy of Şāghānī's work is currently in TSMK, A. 3342 (Karatay: A 7141). This codex is recorded by 'Atufi as Kitāb jāmi' qawānīn 'ilm al-hay'a wa-rasā'il min qibal al-nujūm wa-ghayruhu fī mujallad wāḥid (Book Comprising the Rules of the Science of hay'a, Treatises Pertaining to the Stars, and other [works] in a single volume); see [362] and 318 {13–14}.
 72. The two recorded copies of Şūfī's work on the use of the astrolabe are: [127] (TSMK, A. 3509 [Karatay: A 7045]), which is the 400-chapter work; and [128] (TSMK, A. 3491 [Karatay: A 7047]), which remains unidentified as to its version. No complete copy of the 1,760-chapter version is extant, but there is a partial copy (800 chapters) in Paris, BnF, MS arabe 5098. Fuat Sezgin published facsimile editions of TSMK, A. 3509 and the 170-chapter version in SK, Ayasofya 2642 (Frankfurt am Main, 1986). On Şūfī's astrolabe works, see Sajjad Nikfahm-Khubravan and Pouyan Shahidi, "A Persian Treatise on the Astrolabe Ascribed to 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Şūfī," Tarikh-e Elm 7 (2010): 55–102.
 73. 'Atufi does not mention Kūshyār explicitly, but his work on the astrolabe is contained in SK, Ayasofya 2671, which was in Bayezid II's library; see [66].

King, In Synchrony with the Heavens: Studies in Astronomical Timekeeping and Instrumentation in Medieval Islamic Civilization, vol. 2, Instrumentation of Mass Calculation (Leiden: Brill, 2005), 632–39.
 76. 'Atufi recorded four copies of Tūsī's Bīst bāb: [130] (SK, Ayasofya 2621), [131] (SK, Ayasofya 2620), [132] (SK, Ayasofya 2701), and [133].
 77. Shams al-Ma'ālī's commentary is [135] (SK, Ayasofya 2642) and probably [134] (arguably part of SK, Ayasofya 2664). The latter found its way to Mehmed II's library and then to that of Bayezid II; see Sayyid Muḥammad Taqī Ḥusaynī, Fihrist-i dastnīwis-hā-yi Fārsī-yi kitābkhāna-yi Ayāşūfiyā (Istanbul) (Tehran: Majlis, 1390/2012), 230–31, 233.
 78. Nizāmī's Mi'yār-i āftāb is [56]/[138] (SK, Ayasofya 2677). The original dedication to 'Alī Shīr Nawā'ī has been removed from this copy. The date is indicated at the end of the text by the chronogram mi'yār āftāb nām as well as the number 896; see Sayyid Muḥammad Taqī Ḥusaynī, Fihrist-i dastnīwis-hā-yi Fārsī-yi kitābkhāna-yi Ayāşūfiyā (Istanbul) (Tehran: Majlis, 1390/2012), 239.  81. One of these is entitled Lubāb dar dānistān-i ustūrlāb (The Quintessence on Knowledge of the Astrolabe): [228] (SK, Ayasofya 2618; personal copy of Bayezid II). Others are [122], [177], [215], [216], [217], [218], [219], [220], [226]. In addition, [214], [221], and [227] are catalogued in other chapters.
 82. Sijzi's Kayfiyyat is not explicitly recorded by 'Atufi, but it is part of TSMK, A. 3342 (Karatay: A 7141), which we know was in Bayezid II's library. See [362].
 83. Two copies of Bīrūnī's Istī'āb are [13] (SK, Ayasofya 2576) and [14] (TSMK, A. 3505 [Karatay: A 7046]).

 85. 'Atufi lists ten copies of works on the celestial globe, some or all of which may be by Qusṭā: [102], [103], [104], [105], [106], [107], [108], [109], [110], [111]. [109] is catalogued under kutub 'ilm al-ta'bīr. See Şen and Fleischer's list in this volume for details on the possible current location of these entries.
 86. Al-Wāsiṭī's treatise on the spherical astrolabe is [190], currently TSMK, A. 3509 (Karatay: A 7045).

94. One copy of Mizzi's work on the almucantars quadrant is [72], which may be in TSMK, A. 3119 (Karatay: A 7037).
95. Şen and Fleischer have been able to verify that this work on the quadrant [73] is by Mizzi (currently in SK, Ayasofya 2621).
96. On Qunawī, see Osmanlı Astronomi, 1:84–90 (no. 46.9–13).
97. Qunawī's Tuhfa is [101].
98. Qunawī's work on sundials is [96], currently TSMK, A. 3501 (Karatay: A 7121).

103. Although 'Atufi does not specify authorship, we can identify copies of 'Urđi's Kayfiyyat al-arşād as [187] (SK, Ayasofya 2673), [189] (catalogued under Kutub al-taşawwuf), and [188] (likely TSMK, A. 3329 [Karatay: A 7140]). In addition, 'Atufi recorded an anonymous treatise on celestial observation as [250], which is in SK, Ayasofya 2673.
104. A copy of Khitābī's Tashrīḥ al-ālāt is [51].
105. Works on shadow instruments are [236], [246], and [447] (catalogued under Kutub al-taşawwuf).

107. 'Atufi classifies 128 works as some form of hay'a, and another 5 are unclassified but are clearly hay'a works, for a total of 133. There are also 132 works classified under nujūm, but this includes a far wider range of subjects than hay'a. For details, see our chart.
108. Naşir al-Dīn al-Ṭūsī provides what would become the classic definition of the discipline: "The subject of astronomy is the simple bodies, both superior and inferior, with respect to their quantities, qualities, positions, and intrinsic motions." See Ragep, Naşir al-Dīn al-Ṭūsī's Memoir, 1:90–91 (I. Intr.[2]) and 1:38 ("All simple bodies as the subject matter of astronomy").
109. Although one finds topics dealing with the inhabited world included in Greek astronomical works, it is noteworthy that Islamic astronomers saw themselves as doing something new and considerably expanded. See Ragep, Naşir al-Dīn al-Ṭūsī's Memoir, 1:38.
110. For example, Jaghmīnī's al-Mulakhkhaṣ fi al-hay'a al-basiṭa and Ṭūsī's al-Tadhkira fi 'ilm al-hay'a fall into this hay'a subdivision.
111. Ragep, Naşir al-Dīn al-Ṭūsī's Memoir, 1:90–91, Intr.[1].
112. In fact, George Saliba has maintained that the need to demarcate astronomy from astrology within a strictly Islamic context gave rise to the discipline of hay'a itself. See Saliba, "Islamic Astronomy in Context: Attacks on Astrology and the Rise of the Hay'a Tradition," Bulletin of the Royal Institute for Inter-Faith Studies 2, no. 1 (2002): 25–46, at 25–27, 42; Saliba, "The Development of Astronomy in Medieval Islamic Society," Arab Studies Quarterly 4, no. 3 (1982): 211–25; and Saliba, "Arabic versus Greek Astronomy: A Debate over the Foundations of Science," Perspectives on Science 8, no. 4 (2000): 328–41, at 328–29, 330.
113. It should not be surprising that a scientific discipline based on mathematics and observations would be less objectionable to certain Islamic theologians (mutakallims) than one that seemingly limits God's omnipotence.
114. For example, 'Alī Qūshjī discusses issues related to the possibility of the earth's rotation within his theological commentary to Ṭūsī's Tajrīd al-'Aqā'id; see F. J. Ragep, "Ṭūsī and Copernicus: The Earth's Motion in Context," Science in Context 14, no. 1–2 (2001): 145–63. See also Robert Morrison, "What Was the Purpose of Astronomy in Ījī's Kitāb al-Mawāqif fi 'ilm al-kalām?" in Politics, Patronage, and the Transmission of Knowledge in 13th–15th Century Tabriz, ed. Judith Pfeiffer (Leiden; Boston: E. J. Brill, 2014), 201–29.
115. Eight copies of Ṭūsī's Tahrīr al-Majisṭī (in Arabic) are recorded by 'Atufi as [417], [418], [419], [420], [421], [422], [423] (SK, Ayasofya 2583), [424] (most likely TSMK, A. 3453 [Karatay: A 7005]). One of the unidentified above is TMSK, A. 3328 (Karatay: A 7095).
116. One copy of Nisābūrī's Tafsīr al-Tahrīr is [340]/[425], and two anonymous commentaries are [426] and [427].
117. For a copy (unique?) of Ibn al-Haytham's Sharḥ kitāb Majisṭī Baṭlamyūs fi al-hay'a, see TMSK, A. 3329 (Karatay: A 7140) [309]; it is bound with an anonymous Almagest commentary. Ibn al-Haytham informs us in the introduction to this work that "Most commentators on the Almagest...were more interested in proposing alternative techniques of computation than in clarifying obscure points for the beginner" (Sabra, 6:199). See A. I. Sabra, "Ibn al-Haytham, Abū 'Alī Al-Ḥasan ibn al-Ḥasan," in Dictionary of Scientific Biography, ed. Charles C. Gillispie, vol. 6 (New York: Scribner, 1972), 189–210, at 199, 208 (Add. 3).
118. One copy of Ibn al-Haytham's Ḥall shukūk fi kitāb al-Majisṭī is [308]. Note that this work should be distinguished from Ibn al-Haytham's al-Shukūk 'alā Baṭlamyūs (Doubts about Ptolemy). See Sabra, "Ibn al-Haytham," 6:206–7, III 38.

119. 'Atufi records Bīṭrūjī's work twice as Kitāb 'ajīb fī al-hay'a [263], [264]; it is entitled Kitāb al-Murta'ish fī al-hay'a (Book of Trembling on hay'a) in TSMK, A. 3302 (Karatay: A 7055). Perhaps this is an indication that the work was considered remarkable, if not controversial. For more, see A. I. Sabra's seminal article on how the attempt to return to a purer version of Aristotelian cosmology free of eccentrics and epicycles was tied in with an Andalusian sense of identity ("The Andalusian Revolt against Ptolemaic Astronomy: Averroes and al-Bīṭrūjī," in Transformation and Tradition in the Sciences, ed. E. Mendelsohn [Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984], 133–53).
120. Four copies of Kharaqī's Tabṣira are [310], [311], [312], [313]. The last three are currently SK, Ayasofya 2578; SK, Ayasofya 2579; and SK, Ayasofya 2581. One copy of Kharaqī's Persian 'Umda Khwarazmshāhi' is [316] (TSMK, R. 1719 [Karatay: F 235]). Note that 'Abd al-Jabbār al-Kharaqī is often confused with an older contemporary, Shams al-Dīn Abū Bakr Kharaqī (both share the same nisba).
121. Two autograph copies (in a single volume) of the Sharḥ al-Tabṣira by Muḥammad ibn Mubārakshāh are recorded as [265]/[314] and [266]/[315], currently SK, Ayasofya 2582.
122. Five copies of Jaghmīnī's Mulakhkhaṣ are [267], [268], [269], [270], [271] (TSMK, A. 3296 [Karatay: A 7057]). [267] is catalogued by 'Atufi under Kutub 'ilm uṣūl al-dīn. [268] or [269] may be either SK, Ayasofya 2679 or TSMK, A. 3352 (Karatay: 8744). For a critical Arabic edition and English translation of the Mulakhkhaṣ, see Sally P. Ragep, Jaghmīnī's Mulakhkhaṣ: An Islamic Introduction to Ptolemaic Astronomy (New York: Springer, 2016).
123. 'Atufi's inventory includes two anonymous Persian translations of Jaghmīnī's Mulakhkhaṣ. One is by Muḥammad ibn 'Umar Andiqānī (fourteenth century), [262]/[272], currently SK, Ayasofya 2592; another translation is by Ḥamza ibn Ḥājī ibn Sulaymān (fifteenth century) by the order of Mehmed II, [273]/[307]. There is also an unidentified anonymous commentary of the latter, [301]. [273]/[307] and [301] are currently SK, Ayasofya 2593. See Cevat İzgi, Osmanlı Medreselerinde İlim: Riyazî İlimler, 2 vols. (Istanbul: İz, 1997), 1:388, e1.1, e1.2.
124. An anonymous Turkish translation of Jurjānī's Sharḥ al-Mulakhkhaṣ is [282]/[326].
125. See Robert Morrison, "The Role of Oral Transmission for Astronomy among Romaniot Jews," in Texts in Transit in the Medieval Mediterranean, ed. Y. Tzvi Langermann and Robert G. Morrison (University Park, PA: Penn State University Press, 2016), 10–28.
126. Based on 'Atufi's inventory, the works of the following authors are connected with Jaghmīnī's Mulakhkhaṣ: Yūsuf ibn Mubārak al-Alānī (ca. 1334), Faḍl Allāh al-'Ubaydī (d. 1350), Kamāl al-Dīn al-Turkmānī (d. 1357), al-Sayyid al-Sharīf al-Jurjānī (d. 1413), Qāḍizāde al-Rūmī (d. ca. 1440), Faṭḥ Allāh al-Shirwānī (d. 1486), Sinān Pasha (d. 1495), Muḥyi al-Dīn Niksārī (d. 1495), Muḥammad ibn 'Umar Andikānī (15th c.), and Ḥamza ibn Ḥājī ibn Sulaymān (15th c.). Qarā Sinān (d. ca. 1480–81), who dedicated his Sharḥ al-Mulakhkhaṣ to Bayezid II, may be the author of the remaining unidentified anonymous commentary recorded as [300]/[354]; see Osmanlı Astronomi, 1:40–41 (no. 14.1); Kashf al-ẓunūn, 2: col. 1819. (For Şen and Fleischer's entry numbers for each author, see below.)
127. Three copies of Tūsī's Risāla-i Mu'iniyya (in Persian) are [390], [391], [392], plus one copy of its appendix (Ḥall recorded as Sharḥ) is [393]. [390] and [393] are in SK, Ayasofya 2670. SK, Ayasofya 2592 also contains a copy of the Mu'iniyya, its appendix, and Tūsī's Bist bāb (bound with [262]/[272]); these copies do not seem to be in 'Atufi's inventory.
128. Five copies of Tūsī's Tadhkira (in Arabic) are [394] (possibly TMSK, A. 3317 [Karatay: A 7081]), [395] (TSMK, A. 3333 [Karatay: A 7082]), [396], [397], [398] (most likely TSMK, A. 3453 [Karatay: A 7005]). [396] and [397] both are bound with Nizām al-Dīn al-Nisābūrī's commentary; one of these is probably SK, Ayasofya 2589. There are also fourteen copies of eight commentaries: seven are by Nisābūrī ([333]/[399], [334]/[400], [335]/[401], [336]/[402], [337]/[403], [338]/[404], [339]/[405]), and seven are anonymous ([410], [411], [412], [413], [414], [415], [416]). Among the anonymous copies, two are by al-Sayyid al-Sharīf al-Jurjānī [327] and Faṭḥ Allāh al-Shirwānī (d. 1486) [385].
129. There is one copy of Tūsī's Zubdat al-idrāk recorded as [428], most likely TMSK, A. 3430 (Karatay: A 8749).
130. For copies of Tūsī's Tahrīr al-Majisī and commentaries on it, see notes 115 and 116 above.
131. Five copies of Tūsī's Zubda-i hay'a (in Persian) are recorded as [429], [430] (SK, Ayasofya 2670), [431], [432] (TMSK, A. 3455 [Karatay: A 8752]), [433], plus an anonymous translation of the work into Arabic [434]. 'Atufi catalogues [433] under al-Kutub al-ṭibbiyya and [434] under Kutub 'ilm al-sarf wa-al-naḥw. For a brief overview of Tūsī's hay'a works, see Ragep, Naṣīr al-Dīn al-Tūsī's Memoir, 1:20–23, 56, 65–67.
132. Four copies of Mas'ūdī's Kitāb-i Jahān-dānish are [328], [329], [330], [331].
133. One copy of Jājaramī's Faṣṣ al-khātām fī hay'at al-'ālam (in Persian) is [317], currently TMSK, A. 3337 (Karatay: F 227).
134. Five copies of Shīrāzī's Nihāyat al-idrāk (in Arabic) are [364], [365] (probably TSMK, A. 3336 [Karatay: A 7101]), [366] (TSMK, A. 3333 [Karatay: A 7082]), [367], [368]. See F. J. Ragep, "Shīrāzī's Nihāyat al-Idrāk: Introduction and Conclusion," Tarikh-e Elm 11 (2013): 41–57; and (more generally) Kaveh Niazi, Qūṭb al-Dīn Shīrāzī and the Configuration of the Heavens: A Comparison of Texts and Models (New York: London: Springer, 2014), esp. 85–122 (ch. 4: The Principal Astronomical Sources).
135. Seven copies of Shīrāzī's Tuhfa (in Arabic) are [370], [371], [372], [373], [374], [375], [376]. Two of the above are currently SK, Ayasofya 2585 and Ayasofya 2587. There are also four Tuhfa commentaries: an autograph copy by 'Alī Qūshjī entitled Sharḥ al-Tuhfa al-shāhiyya ([361]/[377]); SK,

- Ayasofya 2643), and three anonymous ones ([378], [379], [380]).
136. There are two copies of Shīrāzī's Fa'alta fa-lā talum (in Arabic) recorded as [381]/[406], [382]/[407]. These are SK, Ayasofya 2668 and TSMK, A. 3338 (Karatay: A 7094), listed identically in the inventory as Fa'altu fa-lā talum. See F. J. Ragep, "New Light on Shams: The Islamic Side of Σάμψ Πουχάρης," in Politics, Patronage, and the Transmission of Knowledge in 13th–15th Century Tabriz, 231–47, esp. 234–35.
 137. One copy of Shīrāzī's Ikhtiyārāt-i Muẓaffarī fi al-hay'a (in Persian) is [383], currently TSMK, A. 3310 (Karatay: F 233). See Amir-Mohammad Gamini, "The Planetary Models of Qūṭb al-Dīn al-Shīrāzī in the Ikhtiyārāt-i Muẓaffarī," Tarikh-e Elm 8 (2009): 39–54.
 138. One copy of Nīsābūrī's Tafṣīr [or Sharḥ] Tahrīr al-Majīstī is [340]/[425]. Seven copies of his Tawḍīḥ (or Sharḥ) al-Tadhkira are [333]/[399], [334]/[400], [335]/[401], [336]/[402], [337]/[403] (probably SK, Ayasofya 2646), [338]/[404], [339]/[405]. Either [334]/[400] or [335]/[401] is SK, Ayasofya 2589 (both are bound with the Tadhkira). SK, Ayasofya 2647 contains one of the remaining unidentified copies. For more on Nīsābūrī, see Robert Morrison, Islam and Science: The Intellectual Career of Nizām al-Dīn al-Nīsābūrī (London; New York: Routledge, 2007).
 139. One copy of Alānī's Ṭurar al-Mulakhkhaṣ is [261]/[296], currently TSMK, A. 3308 (Karatay: A 7060). See İzgi, Riyazī İlimler, 1:389, e2; and S. P. Ragep, Jaghminī's Mulakhkhaṣ, 284.
 140. Kamāl al-Dīn al-Turkmānī is the author of the anonymous Sharḥ al-Mulakhkhaṣ recorded by 'Atufi as [299]/[389], which is bound with Jurjānī's Sharḥ al-Mulakhkhaṣ (currently SK, Ayasofya 2653). For more on Turkmānī, see İhsan Fazlıoğlu, "Kamāl al-Dīn al-Turkmānī," in The Biographical Encyclopedia of Astronomers, 609; İzgi, Riyazī İlimler, 1:389–90, e4; Kashf al-zunūn, 2: col. 1819; Ṭāshkubrīzāde, Miftāḥ al-sa'āda, 349.
 141. Two copies of 'Ubaydī's Bayān al-Tadhkira are [408]/[435], [409]/[436]. Two copies of his Sharḥ al-Mulakhkhaṣ are [297]/[437] and [298]/[438] (SK, Ayasofya 2474). Both [297]/[437] and [409]/[436] are in TSMK, A. 3325 (Karatay: A 7058). See İzgi, Riyazī İlimler, 1:389, e3; Kashf al-zunūn, 2: col. 1819; Ṭāshkubrīzāde, Miftāḥ al-sa'āda, 349.
 142. One copy of Jurjānī's Sharḥ al-Tadhkira is [327], most likely TSMK, A. 3320 (Karatay: A 7091). For more on Jurjānī, see İhsan Fazlıoğlu, "The Samarqand Mathematical-Astronomical School: A Basis for Ottoman Philosophy and Science," Journal for the History of Arabic Science 14 (2008): 3–68.
 143. There are eight copies of Jurjānī's Sharḥ al-Mulakhkhaṣ recorded as [274]/[318], [275]/[319], [276]/[320], [277]/[321], [278]/[322], [279]/[323] (SK, Ayasofya 2653), [280]/[324], [281]/[325]. Three unidentified copies are most likely in SK, Ayasofya 2654; TSMK, A. 3297 (Karatay: A 7063); TSMK, A. 3298 (Karatay: A 7067). See İzgi, Riyazī İlimler, 1:390–91, e9; Kashf al-zunūn, 2: col. 1819; and Ṭāshkubrīzāde, Miftāḥ al-sa'āda, 349.
 144. An anonymous Turkish translation of Jurjānī's Sharḥ al-Mulakhkhaṣ is [282]/[326].
 145. Ten copies of Qāḍizāde al-Rūmī's Sharḥ al-Mulakhkhaṣ are [283]/[341], [284]/[342], [285]/[343], [286]/[344] (SK, Ayasofya 2659), [287]/[345], [288]/[346], [289]/[347], [290]/[348], [291]/[349], [292]/[350]). Four unidentified copies are most likely in SK, Ayasofya 2662; TSMK, A. 3297 (Karatay: A 7063); TSMK, A. 3303 (Karatay: A 7064); TSMK, A. 3331 (Karatay: A 7075). For more on Qāḍizāde, see Fazlıoğlu, "The Samarqand Mathematical-Astronomical School"; İzgi, Riyazī İlimler, 1:372–73; Kashf al-zunūn, 2: col. 1819. See also Osmanlı Astronomi, 1:8–21 (no. 5.3) to get a sense of the many copies of Qāḍizāde's commentary in Istanbul libraries alone, which number about three hundred.
 146. Seven copies of glosses (hāshiyas) on Jaghmīnī's Mulakhkhaṣ are [293]/[332]/[351], [294]/[352]/[384], [295]/[353]/[363], [302], [303], [304], [305]. The gloss on Jurjānī's Sharḥ al-Mulakhkhaṣ (SK, Ayasofya 2608) is either [303] or [304], both listings being anonymous. There is only one other anonymous extant gloss on Jurjānī's Sharḥ al-Mulakhkhaṣ, copied in 880/1475 by Muṣṭafā ibn 'Abd Allāh (TSMK, A. 3298 [Karatay: A 7067]). In comparison, Qāḍizāde's Sharḥ al-Mulakhkhaṣ inspired at least twenty-six glosses. See S. P. Ragep, Jaghminī's Mulakhkhaṣ, 285–89, nos. 10, 10.a–b (Jurjānī); and 12, 12.a–x (Qāḍizāde).
 147. One copy of Shirwānī's gloss on Qāḍizāde's Sharḥ al-Mulakhkhaṣ of Jaghmīnī is [294]/[352]/[384], currently TSMK, A. 3294 (Karatay: A 7077). There is also one copy of his Sharḥ al-Tadhkira recorded as [385], currently TSMK, A. 3314 (Karatay: A 7093). See Fazlıoğlu, "The Samarqand Mathematical-Astronomical School"; Osmanlı Astronomi, 1:42–45; İzgi, Riyazī İlimler, 1:385, c1; and Kashf al-zunūn, 2: col. 1819.
 148. One copy of Sinān al-Dīn Yūsuf ibn Khidr Beg ibn Jalāl al-Dīn 'Arif's (known as Sinān Pasha) gloss on Qāḍizāde's Sharḥ al-Mulakhkhaṣ is [295]/[353]/[363], currently TSMK, A. 3299 (Karatay: A 7074). See Osmanlı Astronomi, 1:47 (no. 17.1); İzgi, Riyazī İlimler, 1:385, c3; and Kashf al-zunūn, 2: col. 1819.
 149. There are three copies of Muḥyī al-Dīn Muḥammad ibn Ibrāhīm ibn Hasan al-Niksārī al-Rūmī's gloss on Qāḍizāde's Sharḥ al-Mulakhkhaṣ. One copy is listed as Hāshiya Sharḥ al-Chaghminī li-al-Niksārī fi 'ilm al-hay'a, namely [293]/[332]/[351] (SK, Ayasofya 2656). The other two copies are unattributed; however, TSMK, A. 3291 (Karatay: A 7117) contains Niksārī's gloss with Ghulām Sinān's commentary on 'Alī al-Qūshjī's al-Risāla al-fathīyya, as does TSMK, A. 3290 (Karatay: A 7116). See Osmanlı Astronomi, 1:61–62 (no. 29); and İzgi, Riyazī İlimler, 1:385, c5.
 150. One copy of Qūshjī's Sharḥ al-Tuḥfa is [361]/[377], which 'Atufi says is an autograph. There are two extant copies of this work with Bayezid II's seal, namely SK, Ayasofya 2643 and TSMK, A. 3304 (Karatay: A 7109). It is not clear which, if either, is in Qūshjī's hand. See Osmanlı Astronomi, 1:36 (no. 11.8).

151. Two copies of Qūshjī's Risāla dar 'ilm al-hay'a are [359] (SK, Ayasofya 2640), [360] (SK, Ayasofya 2639). The small number is surprising given the enormous popularity of the work (see Osmanlı Astronomi, 1:30–33 [no. 11.2], which lists more than 75 copies). The work would inspire commentaries and would be translated into Turkish and into Sanskrit as Hayatagrantha (the earliest known copy dating to 1674). See David Pingree, "Indian Reception of Muslim Versions of Ptolemaic Astronomy," in Tradition, Transmission, Transformation, 471–85, at 474–76.
152. Three copies of Qūshjī's al-Risāla al-Faḥḥiyya are [355], [356] (SK, Ayasofya 2733), and [357] (recorded under al-Kutub al-ṭibbiyya). See Osmanlı Astronomi, 1:33–35 (no. 11.3).
153. One copy of Ghulām Sinān's Faḥ al-faḥḥiyya fī sharḥ al-Faḥḥiyya is [306]/[358], currently TSMK, A. 3291 (Karatay: A 7117). TSMK, A. 3290 (Karatay: A 7116) may contain another copy of this work that is not recorded. See Osmanlı Astronomi, 1:68 (no. 35). Mirim Çelebi's Sharḥ al-Faḥḥiyya fī al-hay'a was completed under Sultan Selim I, and so is not in 'Atufi's inventory. On the other hand, his Sharḥ-i Zīj-i Ulugh Beg is listed [74].
154. One copy of al-Sālār's Kitāb jāmi' al-qawānīn is [362], currently TSMK, A. 3342 (Karatay: A 7141). Al-Sālār has sometimes been dated to the thirteenth century; for an argument placing him in the eleventh century, see Ḥossein Masoumi Hamedani, "Ḥusām al-Dīn Sālār and His Compendium of the Laws of the Science of Astronomy," Tarikh-e Elm 8 (2011): 73–109; and Ḥusayn Ma'sūmī Hamadānī, "Ḥusām al-Dīn Sālār," in Dā'irat al-ma'ārif-i buzurg-i Islāmī (The great Islamic encyclopedia), vol. 20 (Tehran, 2014), 473–78.
155. A copy of Thābit's treatise is [387].
156. A copy of the commentary on Thābit's treatise is [388].
157. These include the following that seem to be actual hay'a works: [251], [252], [440], [441], [442], [443], [444], [445], [446], [448]. [248] is on the armillary sphere but is listed as fī 'ilm al-hay'a. [443] is listed under Kutub al-taṣawwuf.
158. There are 21 Persian copies listed for 11 compositions that are recorded under the category hay'a (out of a total of 129 hay'a works listed in the inventory). These are: two translations of Jāghmīnī's Mulakhkhaṣ (one by Muḥammad b. 'Umar Andiqānī [fourteenth century] [262]/[272], one by Ḥamza b. Ḥājī b. 160. Besides the interests of Bayezid II and Mehmed II, the collection also indicates the wide-ranging interests of their courts and the possibilities for students to access this knowledge at the palace school for raising new Ottoman bureaucrats. See El3, s.v. "Enderun Mektebi," by Orlin Sabev.
161. For a comprehensive account of the definitions and the position of ḥisāb in the classification of science through the pre-modern Islamic period and the structure of arithmetical writings, see Ḥusayn Ma'sūmī Hamadānī, "Ḥisāb," Dā'irat al-ma'ārif-i buzurg-i Islāmī (The great Islamic encyclopedia), vol. 20 (2014), 450–70. For a concise summary of the tradition, see El3, s.v. "Arithmetic," by Sonja Brentjes.

For more on Tabarī, see Heinrich Hermelink, "The Earliest Reckoning Books Existing in the Persian Language," Historia Mathematica 2 (1975): 299–303; and Muḥammad Amīn Riyāḥī, Miftāḥ al-mu'āmilāt (Tehran, 1349sh/1970–71), 38–40.
166. Sajāwandi's dates are not established; Osmanlı Matematik gives his death date as 600/1204. 'Atufi recorded one copy of his work as Risāla Abī Ṭāhīr al-Sijāwandī bi-al-'arabiyya fī al-ḥisāb [490]. This is most likely his al-Tajnis fī al-ḥisāb, currently in SK, Ayasofya 4855. See Ekmeleddin İhsanoğlu, Ramazan Şeşen, and Cevat İzgi, Osmanlı Matematik Literatürü Tarihi (History of mathematical literature during the Ottoman period), 2 vols. (Istanbul, 1999), 1:42.

169. Ṭūsī's algebra is in SK, Ayasofya 4855, fols. 166b–178a. This may be the work listed by 'Atufi in [499]. Another possibility for [499] is a work on algebra by Abū al-'Alā' Muḥammad ibn Aḥmad al-Bihishti al-Isfarā'ini (d. 1502); see TSMK, A. 3136 (Karatay: A 7024).
 170. See Maryam Zamani, Two Treatises of 'Izz al-Dīn Zanjānī, Facsimile Edition of Manuscript no. 3457, Library of Sultan Ahmad III, Topkapı (Istanbul) (Tehran: Mirāth-i Maktūb, 2016), 9–22.
 171. Two copies of Zanjānī's Umdat al-ḥisāb are [503] and [504] (TSMK, A. 3145 [Karatay: A 7009] and TSMK, A. 3457 [Karatay: A 7008], respectively).

The work itself was dedicated to the ruler of Isfahan, Bahā' al-Dīn Muḥammad (d. 1279), the son of Shams al-Dīn al-Juwaynī (d. 1284), who had been a prominent minister of the Ilkhanid state.
 175. The four copies of al-Fārisī's Sharḥ al-Fawā'id are [450]/[465], [451]/[466], [452]/[467], and [453]/[468].
 176. This anonymous commentary on the Fawā'id is [471].
 177. Two copies of Yaḥyā ibn Aḥmad al-Kāshī's commentary are [459]/[469] and [460]/[470], currently SK, Ayasofya 2716 and TSMK, A. 3142 (Karatay: A 6999), respectively.

The work was dedicated to 'Alā' al-Dīn Muḥammad ibn Maḥmūd al-Faryūmadhī (fl. ca. 1316). This Turkistānī is the same person to whom Kamāl al-Dīn al-Fārisī dedicated his optical work al-Baṣā'ir fī ikhtisār Tanqīḥ al-Manāẓir (Insights on Abridging Tanqīḥ al-Manāẓir).
 181. Al-Gharbī's commentary is [454]/[496], currently TSMK, A. 3117 (Karatay: A 7012).

 185. This anonymous Persian commentary on the Shamsiyya is [481]/[527].
 186. Al-Kāshgharī's full name is 'Abd Allāh ibn As'ad ibn 'Umar al-Kāshgharī. 'Atufi lists one copy of his al-Risāla al-Imādiyya [456], currently SK, Ayasofya 2739. The work is dedicated to 'Imād al-Dīn Ḥaydara ibn Muḥyī al-Dīn ibn Maḥyā al-'Abbāsī (fl. ca. 1310).
 187. Qāḍī al-Humāmiyya's full name is Jamāl al-Dīn Aḥmad al-'Abbās Aḥmad ibn Thābit, Qāḍī al-Humāmiyya. There is one copy of the Ghunya [482] in the inventory, currently SK, Ayasofya 2728. See D. A. King, A Survey of the Scientific Manuscripts in the Egyptian National Library (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1986), 57 (C11).

 190. 'Atufi recorded one copy of Mukhtaṣar al-Ṣalāhiyya fī al-ḥisāb ([485], currently TSMK, A. 3133 [Karatay: A 7010]). On the authorship, see İhsan Fazlıoğlu, "Musa (Kadı-zade)," Yaşamları ve Yapıtlarıyla Osmanlılar Ansiklopedisi, vol. 2 (Istanbul, 1999), 255–58; and Fazlıoğlu, "Kadı-zade-i Rumi," Türkiye Diyanet Vakfı İslam Ansiklopedisi, vol. 24 (Istanbul, 2001), 98–100. In Osmanlı Matematik 1:5–6 (no. 1.3), the work is attributed to Qaḍizāde and the date of composition is given as 784/1382.
 191. The three commentaries on the Mukhtaṣar al-Ṣalāhi are [486] (currently in TSMK, A. 3133 [Karatay: A 7010]), [487], [488]. Each of the latter two is either TSMK, A. 3141 (Karatay: A 7011) or SK, Ayasofya 2751. 'Atufi also recorded a Sharḥ mukhtaṣar fī al-ḥisāb [523], but it is not clear whether this is related to the Mukhtaṣar al-Ṣalāhi. In TSMK, A. 3141, the name of the commentator is given as Shams al-Dīn Muḥammad al-Khaṭībī, who was possibly Shams al-Dīn Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad ibn al-Shaykh al-Ṣāliḥ al-Wārī' ibn Abī al-Ḥasan 'Alī al-Khaṭīb al-Irbīlī, for whom see B. A. Rosenfeld and Ekmeleddin İhsanoğlu, Mathematicians, Astronomers, and Other Scholars of Islamic Civilization and Their Works (7th–19th c.) (Istanbul: IRCICA, 2003), 303. Cf. Osmanlı Matematik 1:6 (no. 1.3).
 192. One copy of Tuhfat al-ṣudūr fī al-ḥisāb [455], which is known to be in Persian, is oddly catalogued in a miscellaneous volume listed in the chapter on Arabic literature (228 {1}).
 193. His full name is Maḥmūd ibn Muḥammad ibn Qawām al-Hirawī al-Wālishtānī; 'Atufi lists the work as Risāla fārisiyya fī 'ilm al-ḥisāb (A Persian Treatise on the Science of Arithmetic) [500], currently SK, Ayasofya 2735. It is more commonly known as Mukhtaṣar dar 'ilm-i ḥisāb (An Abridgement on the Science of Arithmetic); see Sayyid Muḥammad Taqī Ḥusaynī, Fihrist-i dastnawis-hā-yi

- Fārsī-yi kitābkhāna-yi Ayāşūfiyā (Istanbul)* (Tehran: Majlis, 1390sh/2012), 252–54.
194. ‘Atufi recorded one copy of Khayr al-Dīn’s Mushkil-gushā-yi ḥussāb [472]. Before serving Bayezid II, Khayr al-Dīn dedicated another of his Persian works, Miftāḥ-i kunūz-i arbāb-i qalam va mişbāḥ-i rumūz-i aṣḥāb-i raqam (The Key to the Authors’ Treasure and Light on the Arithmeticians’ Symbols), to Mehmed II. Pīr Maḥmūd al-Şidqī al-Adarnawī (fl. ca. 1490) translated the Miftāḥ into Turkish for Bayezid II. Neither the Miftāḥ nor its translation are in ‘Atufi’s inventory. See Osmanlı Matematik, 1:33–35 (no. 10.1-2).
 195. ‘Atufi lists each work as Risāla fārisiyya fi al-ḥisāb (Persian Treatise on Arithmetic): [511], [516] (currently SK, Ayasofya 2640), [517] (SK, Ayasofya 2728), and [519]. [516] has the copy date of Safar 861. The SK catalogue attributes [517] to Ṭūsī.
 196. Al-Kifāya fi ‘ilm al-ḥisāb is [526], currently in SK, Fatih 3441.
 197. A copy of Kitāb jāmi’ uşul al-ḥisāb is [529]. A non-extant work with this title has been attributed to Ibn al-Haytham.
 198. Two copies of Kitāb al-mi’a wa-al-‘iṣhrīn are [506] and [507]. Interestingly, ‘Atufi classified them as min qibal al-nujūm (pertaining to the stars), which may point to the work being the Jadwal al-nisba al-sittīniyya fi al-‘amal al-falakiyya ilā mi’a wa-‘iṣhrīn by Shams al-Dīn al-Tizīnī, who was the timekeeper of the Umayyad Mosque in Damascus in the late fifteenth century. The work contained a sexagesimal multiplication table (going up to 120), which would have made it useful for astronomical calculations. See D. A. King, “Supplementary Notes on Medieval Islamic Multiplication Tables,” Historia Mathematica 6, no. 4 (1979): 405–17, at 406.
 199. A copy of the Iqnā’ is [528], currently SK, Ayasofya 2715. Edition by İhsan Fazlıoğlu, Uygulamalı Geometrinin Tarihine Giriş: El-İkna fi ilmi’l-misaha (Istanbul: Dergah, 2004).

 204. Five works are recorded as fi al-ḥisāb: [508], [509], [510], [512], [520] (the first four are designated as treatises, the last as an Arabic book). Four works are fi ‘ilm al-ḥisāb: [513], [514], [515], [518] (the first three are designated as treatises, the last as a book). [508] and [513] are catalogued under Kutub al-fiqh wa-kutub manāqib al-a’imma.

Either [581] or [582] is probably Millet, Feyzullah 1359. One of the unidentified copies is SK, Ayasofya 2722. ‘Atufi also listed [580] and [586] each as Kitāb Uqlidis (Book of Euclid). [580] is Ṭūsī’s recension of Euclid’s Data, currently contained in SK, Fatih 3441, folios 83b–127b. [586] is unidentified.
 208. ‘Atufi recorded three copies of Samarqandī’s Ashkāl al-ta’sīs as [557] under handasa; [558] under Kutub ‘ilm uşul al-dīn; and [559] under al-Kutub al-ṭibbiyya. İhsan Fazlıoğlu has analyzed this work and its commentary tradition in his “The Samarqand Mathematical-Astronomical School,” 26–29, where he prefers “Basic Forms of the Existent” as the translated title.
 209. ‘Atufi recorded five copies of Qāḍizāde’s commentary on Ashkāl al-ta’sīs as [550]/[560], [551]/[561], [552]/[562], [553]/[563], [554]/[564]. The supercommentary by Çelebī is [555]/[556]/[565].

Rosenfeld, A History of Non-Euclidean Geometry: Evolution of the Concept of a Geometric Space, Studies in the History of Mathematics and Physical Sciences 12 (New York: Springer-Verlag, 1988).
 212. Although ‘Atufi does not explicitly name them, we can identify copies of these works in codices he does list, namely Ibn al-Haytham’s Sharḥ muşādarāt in Millet, Feyzullah 1359 (probably either [581] or [582]) and Ṭūsī’s al-Risāla al-shāfiyya in TSMK, A. 3342 (Karatay: A 7141) [362].

 215. Al-Jawharī’s work is not cited by ‘Atufi but is in Millet, Feyzullah 1359 ([581] or [582]). See Gregg DeYoung, “Al-Jawharī’s Additions to Book V of Euclid’s Elements,” Zeitschrift für Geschichte der Arabisch-Islamischen Wissenschaften 11 (1997): 153–78.

233. To get a sense of this tradition, especially with regard to musical notation as it developed from Urmawī to Shīrāzī and then to later writers, see Owen Wright, "'Abd al-Qādir al-Marāghī and 'Alī b. Muḥammad Binā'ī: Two Fifteenth-Century Examples of Notation. Part 1: Text," Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies, University of London 57, no. 3 (1994): 475–515.
234. Two copies of Marāghī's Jāmi' al-alḥān are [602] and [603]; each of these is either Nuruosmaniye 3644 or Nuruosmaniye 3645 (the former with a dedication to the author's sons, the latter containing a dedication to Shāh Rukh [d. 1447], the son of Tamerlane).
235. Two copies of Marāghī's Maqāṣid al-alḥān are [604] and [605], one of which is TSMK, R. 1726 (Karatay: F 279), containing a dedication to the Ottoman ruler Murad II (r. 1421–44 and 1446–51).
236. Two copies of Marāghī's Sharḥ-i Kitāb al-adwār are [606]/[620] (TSMK, A. 3470 [Karatay: F 280]) and [607] (Nuruosmaniye 3651).
237. Two copies of the Fawā'id 'ashara are [608], [609]. The first is bound with Marāghī's commentary on Urmawī's al-Adwār and is in Nuruosmaniye 3651.
238. One copy of the Lahniyya is [610].
239. This unidentified work by Marāghī is [611].
240. Three copies of 'Abd al-Azīz's treatise are [599], [600], [601]. One of these is TSMK, A. 3462 (Karatay: F 278). [601] is listed as Kitāb 'Abd al-'Azīz ibn 'Abd al-Qādir fī al-mūsīqī, which presumably is the Naqāwat al-adwār.
241. None of Maḥmūd's works are in 'Atufi's inventory. For manuscript information on them, see Sayyid Muḥammad Taqī Ḥusaynī, Fihrist-i dastnīwis-hā-yi Fārsī-yi kitābkhāna-yi Ayāṣūfiyā (Istanbul) (Tehran: Majlis, 1390sh/2012), 197–99.
242. Two copies of Shirwānī's work on music are [612] and [613]; one of these is TSMK, A. 3449 (Karatay: A 7428). Shirwānī composed two versions of this work; TSMK, A. 3449 is his first version. For an example of the second version, see British Library, Or. 2361 (Owen Wright, "'Abd al-Qādir al-Marāghī and 'Alī b. Muḥammad Binā'ī," 476m10).
243. 'Atufi has three listings of Lādhīqī's works on music. One work [597] is listed as Risāla Faṭḥīyya li-Mawlānā Muḥyī al-Dīn al-Lādhīqī fī al-mūsīqī. Another work [598] is recorded as Zayn al-alḥān bi-al-turkiyya fī al-mūsīqī (Adornment of Melodies in Turkish on Music); whether this work is in the original language, i.e., Turkish, or is a translation from Arabic into Turkish is unclear. The third copy [596] is listed ambiguously as Kitāb Mawlānā Muḥyī al-Dīn al-Lādhīqī fī al-mūsīqī (Lādhīqī's Book on Music); this may well be the Arabic version of Zayn al-alḥān, since this is what we find in Nuruosmaniye 3655. [597] may be Aleppo, Aḥmadiyya MS 1206, since this copy bears Bayezid II's seal and is called Risāla Faṭḥīyya. (See al-Ḥājj Ḥāshim Muḥammad al-Rajab, al-Risāla al-faṭḥīyya (fī al-mūsīqā), li-Muḥammad ibn 'Abdulḥamīd al-Lādhīqī [Kuwait: al-Majlis al-waṭanī lil-thaqāfa, 1986], 19.)
244. One copy of Kashf al-humūm is [624], currently TSMK, A. 3465 (Karatay: A 7424).
245. One copy of Muwashshah jāmi' al-maqāmāt is recorded as [630].

246. Two copies of Gharā'ib al-adwār are [631], [632].
 247. 'Atufi recorded one copy of Adwār al-mūsīqī [633] bound with one copy of Risāla manẓūma [634].
 248. Copies of works with generic titles are [625] (Arabic), [626], [627] (Persian), [628] (Turkish), [629] (Arabic). [625] is listed as Mukhtaṣar bi-al-'arabiyya fī al-mūsīqī, which is one of the aliases for Urmawī's Kitāb al-adwār. Thus [626], listed as Sharḥ al-mukhtaṣar fī al-mūsīqī, may well be Marāghī's commentary on it.

BOOKS ON MATHEMATICAL AND MIXED-MATHEMATICAL SCIENCES: ARITHMETIC, GEOMETRY, OPTICS, AND MECHANICS

The Ottoman imperial palace library inventory, commissioned by Sultan Bayezid II in 908 (1502–3) and completed in 909 (1503–4),¹ is a compilation in Arabic that contains a large corpus of works corresponding to mathematical and “mixed-mathematical” sciences, which are not always categorized or titled as such in the inventory itself. The corresponding entries of this inventory—which was prepared by ‘Atufi, the royal librarian of the Topkapı Palace in Istanbul—are not limited to works with the term riyāḍī (mathematical) in their titles. Nor are they the same sciences that make up the classical “quadrivium,” namely arithmetic, geometry, astronomy, and music (ḥisāb, handasa, nujūm, mūsīqī), which are treated elsewhere in the present volume.² Astronomy is the first of those four sciences (‘ilm) that appears in the inventory, categorized under two distinct headings as the “sciences of astronomy (nujūm) and configuration (hay’a).” It is followed by the other three sciences—arithmetic (ḥisāb), geometry (handasa), and music (mūsīqī)—with the addition of books (kutub) on amusements (lahw), this time without the term “science” (‘ilm) preceding it (MS Török F. 59, 313–37).

As for subjects referred to as “mixed-mathematical” sciences in and beyond the present chapter,³ there is no category or title termed as such in the inventory. Nor was there any such term historically, besides the longer Aristotelian form of “mathematical sciences closer to physical/natural sciences.”⁴ Nevertheless, the term “mixed” fits the representation of these and other mathematical subjects in ‘Atufi’s inventory. This essay considers not only arithmetic and geometry—the subject of its first two parts (I–II)—but also optics and mechanics, the focus of its last two parts (III–IV). Each of these subjects has a corresponding list of entries at the end of the essay, to which are added three supplementary parts under the headings of mathematics, collections, and surveying (V–VII).

The mathematical sciences of arithmetic (ḥisāb) and geometry (handasa) may be viewed as “mixed” in the sense that they involve combinations of different disciplines. The inventory represents each of these two fields as being combined with astronomy (322–32), as well as with other subjects. In the case of arithmetic, however, the entries stand on their own (333–35), as well as being combined with other subjects. Optics (manāẓir) and mechanics (ḥiyāl) are represented with fewer titles in the inventory, and optics occurs less frequently than mechanics, whether listed individually (310, 358–61) or in combination with other subjects. Other relevant cases, such as mathematical (riyāḍī) titles, collections (majmū‘a), and related fields like surveying (misāḥā) have their own groupings.

Especially notable are optics and mechanics: these closest of the age-old “mixed” mathematical sciences, involving “physical/natural” entities,⁵ do not appear under any of the “mathematical” sections, nor do they appear in the same section of the inventory. The most important optical texts, generally titled Manāẓir, as in the Greek optika,⁶ are often listed in the inventory under “Rational Philosophy” (Ḥikma al-falsafīya, 359–60): so is a treatise (risāla) on “Optics” (Manāẓir), followed by one on “Rainbow and Halo” (Qaws-i quzah wa-al-hāla) (361–62). Besides works titled Manāẓir and possible optical titles within related collections (331), a text involving “Shadows” (Zill) and one titled “Burning Mirrors” (Marāyā al-muḥriqa) are respectively entered under astronomy and mechanics (324, 310).

The case of mechanics is quite different. Texts titled Ḥiyāl ([Mechanical] Devices), as in the Greek mechanika, appear mostly under “Books on [Mechanical] Devices” (Kutub al-Ḥiyāl) (310). Their entries also appear next to those involving anything from lifting (rafʿ, jarr) heavy objects or water instruments (ālāt), to motion (mutaḥarrak) and clock (sāʿat) construction. But here, diverse titles are largely entered on the same page as “mechanical” works, crafts, or their “explanation” (bayān). Most of these, in turn, are listed right after books on “Wondrous Crafts” (Ṣanāʿāt al-ʿajība), which appear just before, but not within, the mathematical sections.

Other distinct features include entries on optics under “Rational Philosophy,” which end with the phrase “pertaining to philosophy” (min qibal al-ḥikma) (359–62) or “in philosophy” (fī al-ḥikma) (360–62). Entries on mechanics, grouped mostly as “[Mechanical] Devices” (ḥiyāl), include titles containing terms like “crafts” (ṣināʿa) or “wonder” (ʿajīb) (310).

Optics and mechanics, the two ancient subdivisions of geometry, have mixed representations in the inventory in yet other ways. In one case, optics is included among mechanical texts, and a treatise on mechanics is bound within arithmetical texts (310 {16–17}, 335 {4–5}). In another case, optical and mechanical titles are only recognizable by a combination of geometrical terms like “plane” (basīṭ) and “shadow” (ẓill), or “circles” (dawāʾir) and “moving” (mutaḥarrika) (324 {2}, 310 {8}). Most challenging are cases where inventory entries list works in volumes that contain multiple texts: these are indicated either as being part of a “collection” (majmūʿa) or as being “within the same volume” (fī mujalladin wāḥidin) (331, 310). Occasionally, the same entry is specified by both expressions. The contents of these entries are itemized by subject in the concluding list of entries, under “Collections.” Examples include optics represented by a “Collection” (Majmūʿa), such as “Intermediate [work]s” (al-Mutawassīṭāt)⁷ without a specified title; mechanics by titles recorded “in the same volume” (fī mujalladin wāḥidin) with other subjects; or optics and mechanics having single entries specifying both forms. Other exceptions include the terms manāẓir and ḥiyāl in inventory titles that fall outside optical and mechanical contexts (220–25).

The inventory entries corresponding to mathematical and mixed-mathematical sciences also represent fields beyond optics and mechanics, including surveying, a field with its own disciplinary “mixes,” and theoretical and practical aspects.⁸ Surveying, historically expressed as the science of “measure” (misāḥa), is not specified as such in the inventory. Among the few entries related to the subject, only one has the term misāḥa in its title (334 {7}). Two related titles specifically end with the phrase “pertaining to” (min qibal) arithmetic and geometry (334 {7}, 331 {14–15}), while another two are identifiable by titles pertaining to “height” (irtifāʿ) determination, whose astronomical wordings of “astrolabe” (uṣṭurlāb) and “pole” (quṭb) do not reveal whether these are with or without measurement (320–21).⁹

The inventory entries on crafts or arts (ṣināʿa, fann) are combined with the sciences in different ways. These range from the explicit expression “crafts of sciences like mathematics,” specifying “the science of number, geometry, and astronomy” (319 {9–10}) to an implicit representation of craftsmen (ṣāniʿ) in a title (326 {5}). They also range from the “crafts” of mechanics and those specified as “wondrous” (ʿajība), to titles including the term “construction” (ʿamal) and “instrument” (ālā) (310 {12–13}).

The inventory entries often specify the genre of a work as either book (kitāb) or treatise (risāla), and the language as either Arabic or Persian. But these entries are not always systematic in following traditional classifications and ordering of subjects. Among uncommon classifications are entries containing the term “craft” (ṣināʿa, pl. ṣināʿāt) preceding those containing the term “science” (ʿilm, pl. ʿulūm). These consist of “books on wondrous crafts” (ṣanāʿāt al-ʿajība), which are followed by “books on mechanics” (kutub al-ḥiyāl) in both the inventory’s table of contents and section headings (4 {7, 8}, 302 {10, 11}), and they precede the mathematical “sciences” (ʿulūm) of the next section (4 {11–14}, 313 {6–9}). As for order, the “sciences of astronomy, arithmetic, geometry, music,” are followed by “books on entertainment[s] like chess” (kutub al-lahwi ka al-shaṭranjī) (4 {15}, 313 {10}). Besides the listing of astronomy in these and other sections of the inventory as the first, rather than the third, entry of the quadrivium (4 {11–12}, 313 {6–7}), the inclusion of mathematical games such as chess (shaṭranj) (337 {12–13}) within the classical quartet is historically uncommon, though not unprecedented.¹⁰

Still more striking is the previous section of books on mechanics, which follow immediately after “wondrous crafts” (4 {8}, 302 {11}, 310). These books are not only classified outside the mathematics section, but also without the term “science” (‘ilm), similar to the case of “entertainment[s] like chess.” The opening and closing entries on mechanics are also noteworthy. The first title under mechanics contains the positively charged expression “innovative constructions” (badāyi‘ al-‘amal) (310 {3, 15}), which distinguishes it, as well as the section it introduces, from the preceding section (307–9). The last entry is a work on “burning mirrors” (mayārā al-muḥriqa), which is an optical title (310 {16–17}). It is preceded in the inventory by entries involving instruments (ālāt) applied to water (mā) (310 {12–14}) and sound (ṣawt) (310 {16}). The entries of that section were possibly grouped as such because they involve devices or instruments. They differ from preceding entries, with some items using the term “wondrous” in other contexts. Positioned just before “wondrous crafts,” with subjects from alchemy (kīmīyā) to magic (sīmīyā), some of those entries are unexpectedly preceded by the term “science” (309 {8–9, 16–19}). By contrast, the next two headings, under books on mechanics and wondrous crafts, neither include such subjects, nor fall under the sciences.

My discussion of the two “mixed-mathematical” subjects of optics and mechanics has overshadowed the two “mathematical” disciplines of arithmetic and geometry because of the historical importance of titles catalogued under the former pair. The optical and mechanical texts of the inventory, although few in number compared to the large corpus of texts on mathematics proper, contain important and rare titles. The optical and mechanical titles in the inventory have the added advantage of revealing the distinct transmission and classification of their subjects, often through their titles alone.

In the present essay, I treat arithmetic, geometry, optics, and mechanics successively, according to the importance of their titles and related transmissions. The way in which the entries and their inventory categories were selected reflects a specifically Ottoman context.

I analyze that context not only from the viewpoint of disciplinary and methodological developments,¹¹ but especially from the perspective of textual transmission. This extends the discussion beyond Istanbul at the turn of the sixteenth century, where such fields emerge with distinctive features.

As is well known, the earliest phase of the transmission of the four sciences under discussion is associated with eighth- and ninth-century Baghdad through Arabic translations of Greek optical and mechanical works, some later known only through their Arabic versions.¹² The textual traditions of arithmetic, geometry, optics, and mechanics are documented as far back as ancient Greek works devoted to those subjects. In the case of arithmetic and geometry, the foundational texts are several books of Euclid’s Elements (ca. 300 BCE).¹³ In the case of optics, foundational texts were authored by both Euclid and Ptolemy (second century),¹⁴ while in mechanics essential works were by Heron and Pappus of Alexandria (second and fourth century, respectively).¹⁵ Most of these texts are represented in the inventory.

The next phase of textual transmission extends to the twelfth and thirteenth centuries in both Islamic and European lands, through Arabic and Latin versions of translations and compositions, some preserved only in Arabo-Latin versions.¹⁶ My discussion of the distinct representations and transmissions of all four sciences starts with the most notable inclusions in the inventory, and generally follows the order of the entries, as well as the accompanying manuscript copies and derivative texts in each section. After discussing these entries, I assess major exclusions from the inventory and attempt to offer some explanations for these omissions.

I. ARITHMETIC

The textual tradition of arithmetic, which like geometry, optics, and mechanics is documented as far back as ancient Greek works, is represented in ‘Atufi’s inventory in a manner that outweighs the other three disciplines of the quadrivium. But this is so only quantitatively, insofar as the major titles and entries on different aspects of arithmetic outnumber those of all three other subjects. Arithmetical works, whether combined with other subjects (322–32) or itemized separately (333–35), are represented in single and multiple copies, as well as in commentaries. Subjects variously combined with arithmetic range from astronomy and rational philosophy (322–32) to jurisprudence (fiqh) and medicine (ṭibb) (98–99). Some important works on the subject of theoretical arithmetic or the “science of numbers” are left out of this section. Books from the Elements of Euclid with a strong Arabic tradition, including parts of its thirteen books called “arithmetic books,”¹⁷ are not titled as such. Instead, the books of Euclid’s Elements are listed as “geometry” (handasa) in multiple copies (324, 326) and various versions (326–31), including a commentary on its tenth book. Some practically oriented works are classified under calculations involving instruments (333), inheritance (al-farāʿid) (99), and measurements in surveying or algebra, all with some form of the term “arithmetic” (ḥisāb) in their titles (334–35). But there are unexpected exclusions from the few titles in algebra (335) and from the topic of surveying, in particular (334). In algebra, these omissions include works of Khwarazmi (d. ca. 870), Thabit ibn Qurra (d. ca. 901), Abu Kamil (d. ca. 930), and ‘Umar Khayyam (d. ca. 1123).¹⁸ Excluded from the surveying section are the works of Ya‘qub al-Kindi, Abu Mansur Baghdadī (d. ca. 1037), Abu al-Fath Isfahani (d. after ca. 1119), Abu Bakr al-Khalil al-Tajir (possibly ca. 1300s), and Badr al-Din Tabari (ca. 1421),¹⁹ some of which were represented by manuscripts in Istanbul, as cited in major reference sources.

Also excluded are authors whose works are represented elsewhere in the inventory, such as the arithmetical works of Abu al-Wafa’ Buzjani (d. ca. 998): his “geometry needed by craftsmen” is listed (326 {5}), but not his “arithmetic needed by secretaries.”²⁰ The case of Ibn al-Haytham is also puzzling because a work on the “height of poles” that names him is included in the inventory (320 {19}–321 {1–2}), but some of his surveying works on determining high elevations, e.g., of mountains and clouds, as well as his important surveying work, “Principles of Measurement,”²¹ are excluded—unless they were part of his “Collection.” Rather than indicating an interest in alternative subjects, the missing arithmetical titles suggest problems in the transmission of texts, which may have affected the direction of specific developments (or non-developments) in the Ottoman context, as discussed further below under other subjects covered in this chapter, starting with geometry.

II. GEOMETRY

Geometry represents a distinct case in terms of its theoretical and practical aspects in ‘Atufi’s inventory. Despite the absence of a separate heading introducing geometrical entries, other than astronomy (328–31), the subjects that are combined with geometry, from rational philosophy to medicine (351, 166), attest to an interest in the field’s theoretical and practical aspects, as well as the educational promise of combined volumes. Theoretical entries are dominated by standard books from ancient Greek traditions. The most well-represented entries are those concerning the Elements of Euclid translated from the Greek original, which range from definitions of that text to its variations (324, 326–31). There are also comprehensive versions of the work, representing its Arabic and Persian traditions by Nasir al-Din Tusi (d. ca. 1274) and Qutb al-Din Shirazi (d. ca. 1311), respectively (326–31).

The Conics (Makhrūṭāt) of Apollonius is another repeated title. Its entries range from an extract (taṣaffuḥ) by an author who is named but not fully identifiable (332 {8}) to the well-known works of Ibn al-Haytham, and possibly “Banu Musa” (fl. ca. 860s) (332, 330). Also included are anonymous titles in a collection (majmū‘a), and a summary (talkhīṣ) by an author identifiable as Abu al-Fath al-Isfahani (331 {12}).²²

A related inventory item is the collection of “Intermediate [Work]s” (Mutawassitāt), a set of books intermediately studied between Euclidean geometry and Ptolemaic astronomy in varying combinations (331).²³ Another popular work listed without an author’s name is Ashkāl al-ta’āsīs (Foundational Propositions) by Shams al-Din Samarqandi (fl. ca. 1275/76), a textbook used in fifteenth-century Samarqand as reported by its resident mathematician Ghiyath al-Din Jamshid al-Kashi (d. ca. 1429),²⁴ recorded together with its commentaries (Sharḥ) in the inventory (327–32). Al-Kashi’s own Miftāḥ al-ḥisāb (Key to Arithmetic) is listed in the arithmetical section of the inventory, but similarly lacks an author’s name (334, 335).

A title that stands out in the inventory's geometrical section is the second entry after Euclid's Elements: the Book of Geometrical Constructions of Abu al-Wafa' Buzjani, appearing here with the shorter subtitle "On What Is Needed [by Craftsmen/Artisans] from Geometrical Constructions" (326 {5}). This is a work whose beautifully transcribed and illuminated manuscript with a seal of the Timurid ruler Ulugh Beg (d. ca. 1449) is still in Istanbul. The manuscript, currently held in the Süleymaniye Library (MS Ayasofya 2753), originally belonged to the imperial library collection of the Topkapı Palace; hence it is almost certainly the one mentioned in 'Atufi's inventory.²⁵ Abu al-Wafa's text is not complemented in the inventory by other titles belonging to that work's rich tradition in either Arabic or Persian.²⁶ Notably, there is no mention of a unique Persian "Anonymous Compendium" related to that tradition, which is titled in Arabic Fī tadākhul al-ashkāl (Interlocking Figures), nor is there any sign of other rare geometrical texts in the manuscript codex containing it.²⁷

The transmission of works included in the geometry portion of the inventory may have affected developments positively in the direction of practical and ornamental geometry, and negatively in the direction of surveying and perspective practices. The prominence of several entries on Euclid's Elements, with books devoted to the application of areas, along with Abu al-Wafa's Geometrical Constructions in the same tradition, and al-Kāshī's Key to Arithmetic, which included dome and muqarnas calculations, implies an interest in the ornamental aspect of geometry. The exclusion of key surveying titles from 'Atufi's inventory, such as those on magnitude determinations involving distances, not just heights, may have hindered developments within the Ottoman lands that were to advance in Europe in the form of "linear perspective." Elsewhere, I have discussed how the transmission of such texts in Europe contributed to the development of perspective studies and their critical components.²⁸

III. OPTICS

From a historical standpoint, the most important entries discussed in this chapter are those related to optics, though they are not given a prominent place in the inventory itself. As noted above, the entries on optics in 'Atufi's inventory lack a section devoted to the subject. Instead, they are mainly classified under "Rational Philosophy" (Hikma al-falsafiya) (348–63) where only some entries contain the term "optics" (manāẓir) in their titles (359–62). Others appear without such a term, as is the case with a treatise on "Rainbow and Halo" (Qaws-i Quzah wa-al-Hāla) in the same section, or with works categorized under collections. The latter include items listed under geometry as part of "Intermediate [Work]s" (331). Indeed, optical titles (manāẓir) exist among most collections in Istanbul as intermediate subjects, studied after Euclid's Elements and before Ptolemy's Almagest.²⁹ Works on optics are also listed in the inventory under astronomy and mechanics, possibly due to relevant "constructions" and "instruments": these are a treatise involving shadows (324 {2}) and a book on burning mirrors (310 {16–17}).

The most outstanding entry in this scattered group is one of the leading works on optics, namely Ibn al-Haytham's Kitāb al-Manāẓir (Book of Optics, composed ca. 1028–38). It has more than one entry in the inventory, and the second entry specifies six of its seven books (maqāla) (359 {7–8}).³⁰ This groundbreaking and celebrated work, known through twelfth- and thirteenth-century Latin translations, a fourteenth-century Italian version, and a late sixteenth-century printed edition, has been closely studied in both its Arabic and Latin traditions.³¹ So has its "checkered history", in terms of the "undeserved misfortune and unexpected good luck"³² of its respective transmission in Islamic and European lands. My own related work includes mapping the paths of the book's transmission alongside the foundational Optics of Euclid and Ptolemy.³³

The inclusion of Ibn al-Haytham's "Book of Optics" in the inventory of the Ottoman palace library, first noted and discussed in a different context by Gülru Necipoğlu,³⁴ is significant in that it documents a previously unknown and relatively late exception to the rule of the limited transmission of this work within Islamic regions. As mentioned above, Latin and Italian versions of this monumental work circulated in Europe between the twelfth and early fourteenth centuries. A notable Arabic commentary on Ibn al-Haytham's Optics was written by Kamal al-Din Farisi (d. ca. 1318/19), a work cited in the inventory next to its summary, neither of which lists the author's name (359 {8, 9–10}, 360 {19}).

The two entries referring to Farisi's optical works stand out in the listings of the palace library inventory in another way. This important commentator on Ibn al-Haytham's Optics is acclaimed as having "saved that text" from oblivion in the author's own native lands.³⁵ The inventory's listing of Farisi's modestly titled Tanqīh al-manāẓir (Revision of Optics), as well as his slightly later Kitāb al-Baṣā'ir fī 'ilm al-Manāẓir (Insights into the Science of Optics), especially without citing their author, is significant.³⁶ These two Arabic titles are notable due to Farisi's critical position as an author on optics whose works may have been read in place of Ibn al-Haytham's rarely accessible foundational work.³⁷ The fact that Farisi is unnamed in the inventory strengthens that assumption without settling the question.

The two copies of Farisi's commentary on Ibn al-Haytham's Optics listed in the inventory may well have been those accessed by later Ottoman authors on optics. The case of the Damascus-born astronomer-mathematician Taqī al-Din ibn Ma'ruf (d. ca. 1585), who was once the director of the Istanbul observatory and who possibly had connections to Europe early in his career,³⁸ is worth a closer look. Taqī al-Din dedicated an Arabic work on optics to the Ottoman sultan Murad III (r. 1574–95) in 982 (1574/75). A. I. Sabra has long claimed that Taqī al-Din read Ibn al-Haytham's Optics through Farisi.³⁹ By referring to the name of Ibn al-Haytham, then, Taqī al-Din and other authors may simply have been indicating their access to the commentary of Farisi and its supposed summary, considering the limited transmission of Ibn al-Haytham's Optics in Islamic lands. Taqī al-Din's optical work, whether or not it was largely based on Farisi's commentaries on optical works, is too late to have been included in the palace library inventory, which was completed in 1503–4. But the recorded presence of Ibn al-Haytham's Optics in the imperial library of the Topkapı Palace, at least since the turn of the sixteenth century, occasions further reexamination. After all, this work could have entered the palace library collection in Bayezid II's reign or earlier under his father Mehmed II (r. 1451–81), though evidence points to it not having been much consulted, with the exception of Kamal al-Din Farisi's commentary based on that work.⁴⁰

Farisi's related optical works, especially the one on rainbows and controlled experimentation, have been the subject of scholarly attention, given the comparable treatment of these topics by Theodoric of Freiberg (d. ca. 1310) in Europe.⁴¹ The recording of the Arabic optical works of Ibn al-Haytham and Farisi in 'Atufi's inventory begins to recolor the "checkered history" of Ibn al-Haytham's Optics in terms of its transmission in Islamic and European lands.⁴² The previously unknown availability of Ibn al-Haytham's Optics in Istanbul before 1503–4, along with the apparent non-transmission to Europe of all its known manuscripts that still remain only in Istanbul, is especially noteworthy. This fact, coupled with the inclusion of Farisi's optical works in 'Atufi's inventory, adds different shades to their assumed internal and external transmissions, with possible east-west passages either before or after 1503–4. All such considerations further extend important historical questions to other understudied areas.

The presence of a treatise titled Qaws-i quzah (Rainbow) among the inventory's titles on optics is consistent with the strong representation of that subject by Farisi, as well as later authors discussed below (361–62). Farisi explicitly incorporated this subject within the disciplinary boundaries of optics in his seemingly well-circulated Tanqīh. This is in contrast to Ibn al-Haytham, whose "Halo and Rainbow" is included in a separate volume of his collected works, a text with a manuscript also in Istanbul.⁴³

The treatise on "Rainbow and Halo" (361 {19}, 362 {1}) in 'Atufi's inventory is attributed to Qadizada Rumi (d. after ca. 1440), while the name of his descendant, Mirim (Miram) Çelebi (d. ca. 1525), is handwritten on the front page of its extant manuscript in Istanbul (361 {19}–362 {1}).⁴⁴ Just before that entry, there is one titled Risāla al-Manāẓir (Treatise on Optics), which appears without any specified author or language and is accordingly entered in the same section as the optical entries under "rational philosophy" (361–62 {1–2}). This optical treatise may be the same anonymous text composed in Arabic and Persian and known through manuscripts only in Istanbul, both naming Sultan Selim I (r. 1512–20), son of Bayezid II.⁴⁵ The Arabic version of that text, whose extant manuscript is dated as being transcribed in 919

(1513–14), still allows a composition date before the completion of the inventory in 1503–4.

If the anonymous Risāla al-Manāẓir listed in the inventory is the same bilingual optical text whose shorter Arabic version bears a similar title, then it would have exposed its readers to various subjects of interest. Most striking is the report in that text of an otherwise unknown and undated outreach from scholars (hukamā) of Europe (Farangistān) to the learned (‘ulamā) in northeast Iran (Khurasān) for “experience” (tajraba) and “testing” (imtahān) of specific mirrors.⁴⁶ The text also refers to phenomena such as wonders (‘ajā’ib) and marvels (gharā’ib), comparable to the European mira-bilia, and testifies to the increasingly positive connotations of these expressions, as well as the widening community of their practitioners.⁴⁷

Last but not least, the inclusion in the inventory of an optical work on burning mirrors among texts on mechanics (hiyal), wonder(s) (‘ajīb/‘aja’ib), and craft(s) (ṣan‘a/ṣanā‘āt) is an indicator of the various aspects of optics itself. Among overlaps between optics and mechanics is the ancient Greek concept of “beyond nature” (para phusin), a notion that finds different expressions in the two fields, which represent distinct courses, especially in transmission, all to be further discussed under mechanics.

Among notable exclusions in the optical entries is the Optics of Ptolemy (ca. 170 CE) and a citation of its Arabic version, which was fully accessible to Ibn al-Haytham.⁴⁸ Why such an important title was excluded from the inventory remains a mystery, unless it was part of collections such as “Intermediate [Work]s,” as is often the case with Euclid’s Optics (331 {18}).

Besides the Optics of Euclid and Ptolemy, whose combined “Summary” is known to have been among Ibn al-Haytham’s works, a few early Arabic texts on optics and catoptrics assumed to have been used by Ibn al-Haytham are not specifically named in the inventory. These range from the relevant works of Ya‘qub al-Kindi (d. ca. 850) and Qusta ibn Luqa (d. ca. 912–13) to the undatable case of Ahmad ibn ‘Isa, whose text on optics and burning mirrors is attested in two known manuscripts, both in Istanbul.⁴⁹ In addition to these early texts, each of which is believed to have been accessible to Ibn al-Hay-tham, whose own Optics superseded them all, the optical works of Nasir al-Din Tusi (d. ca. 1274) are also omitted from the inventory. This is an author on optics who was curiously deprived of access to Ibn al-Haytham’s Optics, as were many other later authors despite the text’s unquestionably strong presence in the 1503–4 inventory of the imperial palace in Istanbul, a city where the known manuscripts of all seven books of that work still reside.⁵⁰

IV. MECHANICS

No major exclusions or related historical questions apply to mechanics. Arabic entries on mechanics, recorded mostly on the same page of the inventory (310), include, in addition to those by Heron and Pappus of Alexandria, one composed by Philo of Byzantium (third cent. BCE).

Arabic compositions with recognizable authors are limited to the work of Ibn Razzaz al-Jazari (ca. 1200), in a listing that records the author as a master (al-raʾīs) and indicates that the text is illustrated (muṣawwar) (310 {11–12}). Another entry on the same work is listed without such specifications in an earlier section (201 {16}). There are also two anonymous texts whose titles suggest other aspects of mechanics, from “self-moving circular entities,” to “constructed clocks” (310 {7–9}). Additional titles variously represent mechanical devices, crafts, and wonders, or all of the above (307–10).

The inventory confirms that practical concerns are dominant in the case of mechanics. Court patronage was already indicated by translations of ancient mechanical works such as those by Heron and Pappus (310, 335). Both Greek authors are associated with early Islamic patrons: the dedication of Qusta ibn Luqa’s Arabic translation of Heron’s Mechanics is associated with an Abbasid ruler, and the anonymous translation of Pappus’s Mechanics, with the three courtier brothers Banu Musa.⁵¹ The inventory titles of Heron’s “Lifting of Heavy Objects” (Rafʿi al-ashyāʾi al-thaqila) and Pappus’s Introduction to [Mechanical] Devices (Madkhal al-Hiyal) reflect practical functions, as does their inclusion within specific mathematical collections (335, 310) as distinct from entries labeled as “entertainments” (lahw).

Entries on mechanics are also recorded in the inventory in a revealing manner. The classification of “books on mechanical devices” next to “wondrous crafts” places them outside the subject of mathematics proper. In contrast to mechanics, the only optical title suggesting practical aspects is that of burning mirrors, itself grouped with mechanical titles. Related distinctions include optical titles not typically associated with ruling patrons or courtiers, as I have noted in other studies.⁵²

The category of “wonders,” which is associated with both crafts and devices (hiyal) in the inventory, provides another useful comparison with optics. Various related terms that evoke a sense of “wonder” appear quite early on in the fields of mechanics and optics. The aforementioned ancient Greek concept of “beyond nature” is represented in mechanics through the pseudo-Aristotelian Mechanical Problems as well as by wondrous mechanical devices, such as a lever that produces amazingly unexpected effects. In optics, wondrous phenomena include the problem of the circular appearance of far “angled” objects, and an early response to this problem expressed by a proposition in Euclid’s Optics.⁵³

Genres such as wonders (‘ajā’ib) and its historical counterpart, marvels (gharā’ib), along with their evolving forms, are documented with positive connotations in no uncertain terms in both Arabic and Persian. These include works written shortly before the inventory dated 1503–4, as comparable trends were emerging in Europe through Latin expressions such as mirabilia.⁵⁴

The increasingly positive associations of such concepts are identifiable in works that date from at least the late 1400s, including those by an author with possibly more than one title represented in the inventory, the unnamed commentator of works under arithmetic (333 {16}). That author, Abu Ishaq Kubanani (d. after 1483), called the impressive Geometrical Constructions of Abu al-Wafa’ Buzjani, for which he was completing a Persian translation, a “wondrous book” (kitāb ‘ujāb), and referred to the works of the book’s initial translator as “marvels” (gharā’ib) in the “crafts of science.”⁵⁵ We have also seen that the terms “wondrous” and “marvelous” were used in a treatise on optics, which may be the same as the one recorded in the inventory (362 {1–2}). In that treatise, known through both Arabic and Persian versions, such terms are used in the positive context of practices that are more advanced in eastern Islamic lands than in Europe. In this passage, as cited above, the anonymous author reports how scholars from Europe reached out to the learned in northeast Iran for “experience and testing” of specific mirrors.

The case of mechanics and the treatment of its titles, which variously involve the expression “wonder,” under a heading outside the mathematical sciences can hardly escape notice. The two mixed-mathematical sciences, mechanics and optics, proceeded with quite distinct developments. Remarkably, some major scientific developments in early modern Europe were already present in Arabic optical and mechanical texts in Islamic lands through concepts such as “controlled experimentation” in optics, and “control over nature” in mechanics. These concepts took different forms and courses of development in optics and mechanics, on the one hand, and in Islamic and European lands, on the other. This is where the explanation of distinct developments in optics and mechanics in disciplinary terms, and those in Islamic and European lands in methodological terms, must be supplemented by their contexts of transmission, as attempted here also for arithmetic and geometry.

NOTES

22. The text Kitāb-u Talkhīṣ al-Makhrūṭāt fī al-handasa (Book of Summary of Conics in Geometry) may be identified as composed by Abu al-Fath Isfahani; for details, see Kheirandish, "Early Tradition in Practical Geometry," which includes a reference to the name Abū al-Faṭḥ ibn Maḥmūd [sic] al-Iṣfahānī as reported in connection with "the Arabic version of Borelli's Latin translation" of parts of Apollonius's Conics in 1661 Florence, according to the Bodleian Quarterly Record of 1921. This seems to be the same author listed as "Isfahani" for a Talkhīṣ al-Makhrūṭāt in Krause's "Stambuler Handschriften islamischer Mathematiker," 484.

34. The significance of the listing of Ibn al-Haytham's book on optics in the inventory of the Topkapı Palace's royal library was first noted and discussed by Gülru Necipoğlu in an architectural context. See her "The Scrutinizing Gaze in the Aesthetics of Islamic Visual Cultures: Sight, Insight and Desire," Muqarnas 32 (2015): 23–61, at 39 and 59n65, where the record of Ibn al-Haytham's Optics in the Ottoman library inventory is noted (59n65) and discussed in the context of the possible inclusion of that work in a collection at Galata Observatory and its relevance to "Ottoman architectural practice" (39).
35. For details, see A. I. Sabra, "The Commentary that Saved the Text: The Hazardous Journey of Ibn al-Haytham's Arabic

- Optics," Early Science and Medicine 12 (2007): 117–33, esp. 131–33; also Kheirandish, "Light and Dark," 72–77, where the preface of Farisi's commentary is also included in English translation.
36. For the respective published and unpublished editions of Farisi's Tanqīh and Baṣā'ir, see this chapter's list of entries (III. 2 and 3). For the listings of their manuscripts in Istanbul, see Krause, "Stambuler Handschriften islamischer Mathematiker," 508–9.
 37. On the assumption that "it was undoubtedly through the Tanqīh [of Farisi] that I. H.'s major doctrines eventually came to be better known in the Islamic world," see Sabra, Optics of Ibn al-Haytham, 2:lxix; the assumed rare accessibility of Ibn al-Haytham's Optics in this late period must be revisited in the light of its inventory records.
 38. On Taqī al-Dīn ibn Ma'rūf and his relevant works, see İhsan Fazlıoğlu's entry in Biographical Encyclopaedia of Astronomers, ed. Thomas Hockey (New York, 2007), 2:1122–24; on his European connections, see Avner Ben Zaken's Cross-Cultural Scientific Exchanges in the Eastern Mediterranean, 1560–1660 (Baltimore, 2010); and Necipoğlu, "Scrutinizing Gaze," 37–39.

 40. The status of Ibn al-Haytham's Optics as "unknown or unused" in Islamic lands has been carefully established by A. I. Sabra after a thorough review of the existing Arabic literature; see Sabra, Optics of Ibn al-Haytham, 2:lxiv–lxviii.
 41. On Farisi and Theodoric, see Lindberg, Theories of Vision from Alkindi to Kepler; and Saira Malek, "Technical Terminology in Medieval Arab Science: The Case of Kamal al-Din and the Rainbow" (master's thesis, Cambridge University, 2008).
 42. An essay titled, "'Checkered History' Recolored: The Changing Fortunes and Misfortunes of Optical Works in Islamic and European Lands," was presented by this author in the Middle East Association in Boston (MESA) in 2016 in a session titled "Legacy of A. I. Sabra: New Perspectives on the History of Science in Islam."
 43. Süleymaniye Library, Atıf Efendi 1714. For color images of the table of contents and sample pages of this volume, see Kheirandish, "Light and Dark," 12.
 44. The manuscript is in the Ayasofya section of the Süleymaniye Library, 2414; on the handwritten name on it, see İhsan Fazlıoğlu, "Mīram Çelebī" in The Biographical Encyclopaedia of Astronomers, 2 vols., ed. Thomas Hockey et al. (New York, 2007), 2:788–89.
 45. Both the Arabic and Persian texts refer to Sulṭān Selīm I son of Bāyezīd II without specifying his relation to the texts, either in the colophon of the short Arabic text, or within the much longer Persian text; both versions are extant in apparently unique manuscripts in Istanbul. The Arabic text, Risāla fī 'Ilm al-Manāẓir (Treatise on the Science of Optics), has the name Sa'd Allāh ibn 'Īsā in the colophon as the copyist, and the alternative forms of the name, Sa'd ibn 'Īsā and Sa'dī Çelebī, in the colophon of the text preceding it in the same codex and the cover page of the codex volume, respectively: Tashköprüzāde, Shaqā'iq al-nu'māniyya fī 'ulamā' al-dawlat al-uthmāniyya, ed. Ahmed Subhi Furat (Istanbul: İstanbul Üniversitesi Edebiyat Fakültesi Yayınları, 1985). The transcribed name(s), date of that mufti and book collector of Constantinople (d. ca. 1538/39), the Arabic manuscript, copyist information, colophon clarification, and primary source (reference kindly provided by Himmet Taşkömür) all indicate that the signed copyist of the Arabic text is not Mīram (or Mirem) Çelebī (d. ca. 1525), which does not rule out the possibility that he was the author of the Arabic or Persian version, or both. For his biography, see: İhsan Fazlıoğlu, "Mīram Çelebī: Maḥmūd ibn Quṭb al-Dīn Muḥammad ibn Muḥammad ibn Mūsā Qāḍizāde," in The Biographical Encyclopedia of Astronomers, 788–89. The Persian text, Risāla fī Sabab ru'yat al-ashyā' wa bayān al-madhāhib fīhi wa bayān ru'yat al-ashyā' fī al-marāyā al-maṣnū'a (Treatise on the Cause of the Vision of Objects and the Explanation of Traditions [on Vision] and the Vision of Objects in Constructed Mirrors) is listed in Fehmi Edhem Karatay, Topkapı Sarayı Müzesi Kültüphanesi Arapça Yazmalar Kataloğu (Istanbul, 1961), 321: Hazin 603/5. The Arabic manuscript has "Esad Efendi 3457" on the cover page of the short text in Arabic transcribed on folios 72a–73b. On the Persian text, see Kheirandish, Arabic Version of Euclid's Optics, 1:1, lviii; Elaheh Kheirandish, "The 'Manazir' Tradition through Persian Sources," in Les sciences dans le monde iranien, ed. Z. Vesel, H. Beikbaghban, and B. Thierry de Crussol des Epesses (Tehran, 1998), 125–45; Elaheh Kheirandish, "Footprints of 'Experiment' in Early Arabic Optics," in Evidence and Interpretation in Studies on Early Science and Medicine: Essays in Honor of John E. Murdoch, ed. Edith Dudley Sylla and William R. Newman, Early Science and Medicine 14 (Leiden, 2009), 79–104; Encyclopaedia Iranica, s.v. "Optics," by Elaheh Kheirandish.
 46. The slightly different Arabic and Persian wordings both refer to an earlier timeframe in the context of the paraphrased passage, though an exact time cannot be determined in either case. For the manuscript references to each, see the preceding note. The bilingual text and its possible relation to the inventory entry is discussed in my forthcoming article, "'From Maragha to Samarqand and Beyond': Revisiting a Quartet of Scientific Traditions in 'Greater Persia' (ca. 1300s–1500s)," as part of the "Idea of Iran" annual symposiums and published volumes, sponsored through the joint efforts of the University of London (SOAS) and the Soudavar Memorial Foundation.
 47. The reference to "companions (ashāb) of wonder (isti'jāb) and marvel (istrighrāb)" reveals a community of practitioners. On relevant expressions and their positive connotations in the late Persian translation of the Geometrical Constructions of Abu al-Wafā' Buzjani completed by Abu Ishaq Kubanani cited above, see Kheirandish, "Early Tradition

- in Practical Geometry." On the historical meanings and distinctions of ʿajāʾib and gharāʾib, and comparable Latin expressions such as mirabilia, see Roy P. Mottahedeh, "ʿAjāʾib in the Thousand and One Nights," in The Thousand and One Nights in Arabic Literature and Society, ed. Richard C. Hovannisian and Georges Sabagh (Cambridge; New York, 1997), 29–39.
48. On the Arabo-Latin text, see Albert Lejeune, L'Optique de Claude Ptolémée dans la version latine d'après l'arabe de l'émir Eugène de Sicile (Leiden: Brill, 1989); and Mark A. Smith, Ptolemy's Theory of Visual Perception. On its atypical access to Ibn al-Haytham, see Sabra, Optics of Ibn al-Haytham, 2:lviii–lx.
 49. For more on early Arabic optical texts, see Elaheh Kheirandish, "The Many Aspects of Appearances: Arabic Optics to 950 AD," in The Enterprise of Science in Islam: New Perspectives, ed. Jan P. Hogendijk and Abdelhamid Sabra (Cambridge, 2003), 55–83. On the likely accessibility of the works by al-Kindi and Ibn ʿIsa to Ibn al-Haytham, see Sabra, Optics of Ibn al-Haytham, 2:26. On Ibn Luqa, see Elaheh Kheirandish, "Qusṭā Ibn Lūqā al-Baʿlabakkī," in The Biographical Encyclopedia of Astronomers; on Ibn ʿIsa, see Kheirandish, "Footprints of 'Experiment'"; on the manuscripts of these optical texts, see Kheirandish, Arabic Version of Euclid's Optics, vol. 1, xlv–xlv. On the two known manuscripts of Ibn ʿIsa in Istanbul, see Krause, "Stambuler Handschriften islamischer Mathematiker," 513–14. It is possible that the anonymous manuscript listed in the entries (310 {16–17}) under Kitābu al-Marāyā al-Muḥriqati (Book on Burning Mirrors) corresponds to the second part of Ibn ʿIsa's Kitāb al-Manāẓir al-Marāyā al-Muḥriqa (Book of Optics and Burning Mirrors).
 50. For the entries of Ibn al-Haytham's Optics in the inventory, see 359 {7–8}. On the Arabic manuscripts of the text, see Sabra, Optics of Ibn al-Haytham, 2:lxix–lxxxiii. Books I–III: SK, Fatih 3212–14, dated 476 (1083); books IV–V: SK, Fatih 3215, dated 636 (1239); book VI: TSMA, Ahmed III 3339, dated 476 (1084); book VII: SK, Fatih 3216, dated 476 (1084); books I–VII: SK, Ayasofya 2448, dated 869 (1464–65); books I–III: TSMA, Ahmed III 1899, dated 915 (1509). Volumes in the Süleymaniye Library are classified as "Ayasofya" (originating from the Topkapı Palace) and "Fatih" (originating from Mehmed II's Istanbul mosque complex to which they were also donated from the Topkapı Palace), while several volumes are still preserved in the Topkapı Palace Museum Library. For the Arabic and Persian optical works of Tusi, see Kheirandish, Arabic Version of Euclid's Optics, 1:xxxvii–xlix; some copies of his Arabic optical treatises in Istanbul are recorded in Krause, "Stambuler Handschriften islamischer Mathematiker," 498.
 51. On some mechanical texts and their court associations, see Kheirandish, "Mixed Mathematical Sciences," esp. 96–97 and nn. 49–50. On functional and entertainment devices and their differences, see George Saliba, "The Function of Mechanical Devices in Medieval Islamic Society," in Science and Technology in Medieval Society, ed. Pamela O. Lang, Annals of the New York Academy of Sciences 441 (New York, 1985), 141–51.
 52. See Kheirandish, "Mixed Mathematical Sciences," 86.
 53. On the expression "beyond nature" in the opening lines of the Pseudo-Aristotelian Mechanical Problems as para phusin, as distinct from kata phusin ("according to nature") (847a11–15), and the context of the Greek tradition, see Mark J. Schiefsky, "Art and Nature in Ancient Mechanics," in The Artificial and the Natural: An Evolving Polarity, ed. Bernadette Bensaude-Vincent and William R. Newman (Cambridge, 2007), 67–108. LIST OF ENTRIES

SECTION ON BOOKS OF ARITHMETIC, GEOMETRY, OPTICS, MECHANICS, MATHEMATICS, COLLECTIONS, AND SURVEYING

(Tafṣīlu [...] kutubi ʿilmi al-ḥisābi wa-kutubi ʿilmi al-handasati wa-al-manāẓiri ... wa-kutubi al-ḥiyali [wa-al-riyāḍiyyati wa-al-majmūʿati wa-al-misāḥā])

This list of entries has seven parts: The first four parts (I–IV) correspond to the four main sciences covered in this chapter: I. Arithmetic (Ḥisāb), II. Geometry (Handasa), III. Optics (Manāẓir), and IV. Mechanics (Ḥiyal); the last three (V–VII) are supplementary parts: V. Mathematics (Riyāḍī), VI. Collections (Majmūʿa), and VII. Other: Surveying (Misāḥā).

Entries for each of these parts with comparable titles and authors in the reference works below¹ are so noted; so are those with overlaps in the “quadrivium” lists within this volume (arithmetic, geometry: Parts I–II here). Of these and other inventory entries covered only in this chapter (optics, mechanics: Parts III–IV, followed by supplementary sections: Parts V–VII), those recorded as part of a collection (majmūʿa) or volume (mujallad) are marked with an asterisk and cross-referenced within corresponding collections (Part VI).

As for the position of an entry within a collection, this is indicated by three dots before or after the entry, corresponding to preceding or succeeding items. Items added to the inventory entries are placed in square brackets; those omitted are in angled brackets. Anonymous texts are placed within quotation marks; questionable authors, dates, and languages are followed by question marks. The language of each text is left as Arabic, unless specified as Persian or uncertain. Entries under each part (I–VII) are presented mostly in the order of those listed in the inventory (1, 2), followed by the number of manuscript copies (1a, 1b), derivative or variant texts (1.1, 1.2), and in chronological order as much as possible. The main reference sources used for this section are cited and abbreviated in the first endnote; the following endnotes supplement entries as needed for the documentation of some titles, authors, or datings.

NOTES

1. Max Krause, "Stambuler Handschriften islamischer Mathematiker," Quellen und Studien zur Geschichte der Mathematik, Astronomie und Physik (Berlin, 1936): 437–532 [= Krause 1936]; Abū al-Qāsim Qurbānī, Zindagīnāmah-i rīyāzīdānān-i dawrah-i Islāmī az sadah-i siyūm tā sadah-i yāzdahum-i hijrī (Tehran, 1986/87) [= Qurbānī 1986/87]; Boris A. Rozenfeld and Ekmeleddin İhsanoğlu, Mathematicians, Astronomers, and Other Scholars of Islamic Civilization and Their Works (7th–19th c.) (Istanbul, 2003) [= Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu 2003]. See also A. Tunç Şen and Cornell H. Fleischer's list of entries on the Mathematical Sciences in this volume.
2. See Şen and Fleischer's list of entries, where a manuscript of this work is cited as SK Ayasofya 2627.
3. The dates of Turkistānī are given in Qurbānī (1986/87, 214) as "alive in 712 [=1312/13]"; in Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu (2003, 247) as "first half of 14th c." (with the text composed in 1312 and translated as "Treatise for 'Alā' al-Dīn"). Şen and Fleischer's list of entries cites four copies of this text in the inventory. Qurbānī (1986/87, 214) refers in his entry on the author to a "text on arithmetic by Abu al-Ḥasan

- ‘Alī ibn Muḥammad ‘Alī ibn ‘Alī ibn Kaykhusruw Bahmanī, which could be a commentary (Sharḥ) on al-‘Alā’iyya”; he also lists a manuscript of the main text in Uppsala, as do Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu (2003, 247).
4. The longer title of this text with the additional term “problems” (masā’il) in it, is listed here as “I.5.1” to include the possibility of it being an anonymous version of that text, in contrast to its treatment as another copy of Turkistānī’s ‘Alā’iyya in Şen and Fleischer’s list of entries.
 5. Şen and Fleischer list this text under al-Turkistānī, while giving the name of the author as “Jalāl al-Dīn ‘Alī al-Gharbī, K. al-mu’jizāt al-najībiyya fī sharḥ al-R. al-‘alā’iyya (The Book of Superior Miracles, known as a Commentary on the Epistle on the Problems of Arithmetic), 334 {11–12}, with a manuscript: TSMK A. 3117 (Karatay: A 7012).” The entry above (I. 5.2) is listed under “Gharbī” as the author because of the documentation in Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu (2003, 248), attributing such a title to that author. But a slightly different title translation is given here than in both Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu and Şen and Fleischer.
 6. Cited in Şen and Fleischer’s list of entries, which mentions a copy now housed as SK Ayasofya 2742. The same list cites “K. fī al-ḥisāb, with a copy now housed as SK Ayasofya 2723.” With the title given in the inventory (334 {4}) as “Kitābun bi-al-‘Arabiyyati fī al-ḥisābi” (A Book in Arabic on the Science of Arithmetic), this text has a separate entry in my list under I.12.2.
 7. This title opening with the term Risāla (treatise), as distinct from the opening term Kitāb of note 6 above, is treated as a different version of that text here under I.6.1. Şen and Fleischer list this as “an unspecified treatise on arithmetic,” under “al-Tūsī, Naṣīr al-Dīn Abū Ja’far Muḥammad b. Muḥammad (d. 1274),” adding that this book should be the copy now housed as SK Ayasofya 2742, a codex with a slightly different title: K. fī ‘ilm al-ḥisāb: see note 6 above.
 8. The dates for Nisābūrī are given in Qurbānī (1986/87, 507–9) as “seventh and eighth centuries,” and in Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu (2003, 238) as “13th–14th c.” Şen and Fleischer’s list of entries provides the date “d. ca. 1329–30.” Here, Nisābūrī’s date is listed as “died after 728 [=1327/38]” based on a note in Qurbānī 1986/87, 507, about a Tafsīr he completed in that year; and the term Shamsiyya is left in the original, as in ‘Alā’iyya referring to ‘Alā’ al-Dīn: see note 3 above.
 9. The author’s last name, Kūbanānī, after the region Kūbanān (more recently, “Kūhbanān”) between Kirman and Yazd, while correctly given in Qurbānī (1986/87, 60–61), is placed there in n.1 next to a certain “Kūbanān in Isfahan.” Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu (2003, 282) have it incorrectly as “Kubnawī.” Şen and Fleischer’s list of entries cites “al-Kirmānī (fl. late fifteenth century).”
 10. This text, listed in Şen and Fleischer as “K. al-kifāya fī ‘ilm al-ḥisāb” has its title translated there as “The Book of Competence in Arithmetic), 328 {19}–329 {1}. Bound with al-Nasawī’s K. al-tajrīd fī-ūṣūl al-ḥandasa (Abstract of Euclid’s Elements) and K. Uqlīdus.” Here I literally translated it as “Book [that] Suffices on the Science of Arithmetic.”
 11. The author’s name is given in Krause (1936, 453–57) as “Thābit b. Qurra ibn Zahrūn”; it is followed by “Ḥarrānī” in Qurbānī (1986/87, 204–10); the latter is followed by “Şābi” in Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu (2003, 48–56); and without any of these parts in Şen and Fleischer’s list of entries.
 12. The dates for this author are given in Qurbānī (1986/87, 23–24) as “d. 728 [=1327/8],” in Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu (2003, 231) as “d. 1325 (?)” and in Şen and Fleischer’s list of entries as “(d. 1324).” Here, I have adopted the latest date from Qurbānī (1986/87, 23), where the dedication of the book to “Bahā’ al-Dīn Muḥammad, son of Sham al-al-Dīn Juvaynī” informs the translation of the part of the title “Bahā’iyya” as “for ‘Bahā’ [al-Dīn],” left out of the translation in Şen and Fleischer.
 13. The dates of this author are based on his death date given in one of the manuscripts of his Kitāb al-Baṣā’ir as 718 [=1318/19]: see Part III, no. 3. The present entry is cited in Krause (1936, 508–10), with three of its manuscripts in Istanbul; in Qurbānī (1986/87, 401–13), with some manuscripts and commentaries of it in libraries in Iran; in Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu (2003, 236) with more manuscripts worldwide. See also Şen and Fleischer’s list of entries. The title translation I have given above (I.11.1) is closest to that of the latter.
 14. The name and dates of the author are given in Krause (1936, 512) as “Imād al-Dīn Baghdādī” with manuscripts of the text in Istanbul under al-Fawā’idi al-bahā’iyyati fī ‘ilmi al-ḥisābi without its opening part İdāhi al-maqaṣidi fī sharḥi...; in Qurbānī (1986/87, 322–23), as “Imād al-Dīn Yahyā ibn Aḥmad Kāshānī, ca. 733–744 [=1343–1373]”; in Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu (2003, 243) as “Imād al-Dīn Kāshī d. 1340.” See also Şen and Fleischer’s list of entries, where the manuscript of this and another variant of it are respectively given as SK Ayasofya 2716 and TSMK A. 3142 (Karatay: A 6999). The name and date in my list (I.112–11.2a) are adopted from Qurbānī (1986/87, 322).

15. The name and dates of this author are given in Qurbānī (1986/87, 124) as “Ahmad Ibn Thābit, d. ca. 671 [=1272]”; in Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu (2003, 211) slightly differently, as “Ahmad Ibn Thabāt” d. 1272/73. Şen and Fleischer’s list of entries gives the title as “Qāḍī al-Humāmīya, Jamāl al-Dīn Ahmad al-‘Abbās Ahmad b. Thābit (d. 1272).”
16. The name of the author is listed in Qurbānī (1986/87, 297) as “Şalāhī,” where the date of his Mukhtaşar is cited from Brocklemann as composed in 735 [=1334/35] along with a commentary on it. Qurbānī includes an incomplete manuscript of a commentary on this text in Mashhad under the title ‘Imādiyya written for a minister called ‘Imād al-Dīn, with a note that the Mashhad catalogue gives the date of this commentary, not the text, as 735 [=1334/35]. See Şen and Fleischer’s list of entries, where the name is given as “Şalāh al-Dīn Mūsā,” with the date “fl. late fourteenth century?” They cite İhsan Fazlıoğlu, who attributes it to Şalāh al-Dīn Mūsā, who lived and flourished before Qāḍizāde al-Rūmī. See Fazlıoğlu, “Kadıze-i Rumi,” Türkiye Diyanet Vakfı İslam Ansiklopedisi. Without a comparable entry in Krause 1936 and Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu 2003, the author’s name and date in my list above (I.14) combines those given in Qurbānī and Şen and Fleischer. The term Şalāh could also refer to the text’s dedicatee rather than its author, as in cases like Bahā’ or ‘Alā’ noted above.
17. The name of the author is given in Qurbānī (1986/87, 297) as “Shams al-Dīn Muḥammad al-Khaṭībī” after Brocklemann. Şen and Fleischer’s list of entries cites this entry under “Şalāh al-Dīn Mūsā (fl. late fourteenth century?),” and mention as copies SK Ayasofya 2751 and TSMK A. 3141 (Karatay: A 7011). They add: “According to both the Karatay catalogue and the catalogue of the Süleymaniye Library, the author of this work bearing Bāyezīd II’s seal is a certain Shams al-Dīn Muḥammad al-Khaṭībī. No information has been found about this individual.”
18. The dates for this author are given in Qurbānī (1986/87, 266–69) as “d. 570 [=1174/75]”; in Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu (2003, 184–86) as “d. ca. 1175”; and in Şen and Fleischer as “(d. 1180).”
19. The dates for this author are given in Qurbānī (1986/87, 391–97) as “d. 420 [=1029–30] after Suter”; in Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu (2003, 119–20) as “d. c. 1025”; and in Şen and Fleischer, as “d. eleventh century.” The translation of the term Kāfī as “Sufficient” in the entry above (I. 16) is given in Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu (2003, 119), in contrast to “Adequate” in Şen and Fleischer.
20. The name and date of this author are given in Qurbānī (1986/87, 85–86) after Suter, where it is added that part of the author’s name, Ḥusayn ibn Aḥmad, is given elsewhere as “Aḥmad ibn Ḥusayn.” Şen and Fleischer list the text under al-Karajī.
21. This entry is treated as an anonymous text since its authorship remains questionable; Şen and Fleischer list it under “al-Arbilī, Aḥmad b. ‘Alī b. ‘Umar b. Şālīḥ (d. twelfth century).” Krause (1936, 513) and Qurbānī (1986/87, 123) list an “Arbilī,” dated by the latter to the “second half of seventh [=thirteenth] century.” Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu (2003, 187) have a “Muḥammad Irbilī” in contrast to the name “Arbilī” in the other sources above, all of which give the text’s title as Kifāya, rather than the Kāfiya of this entry (I.16.2).
22. The name of this author appears as both “Kāshānī” (Qurbānī 1986/87, 365–88) and “Kāshī” (Krause 1936, 513; Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu 2003, 269–72). Şen and Fleischer list him as “al-Kāshī, Ghiyāth (al-Milla wa-) al-Dīn (d. 1429).”
23. Şen and Fleischer list this under “Khayr al-Dīn Khalīl b. Ibrāhīm (d. late fifteenth century),” on which my translation is based.
24. The dates of this author are given in Qurbānī (1986/87, 261) as “d. ca. 470 [=1077/78],” citing Brocklemann for the date of the sixth [=twelfth] century and title of al-Tajnis fi al-ḥisāb as “apparently part of his Farāyid-i Sirājiyya or Sijāwandiyya.” It is given in Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu (2003, 193–94) as “12–13th c.” Şen and Fleischer list this entry under “al-Sijāwandī, Sirāj al-Dīn”; they add, “Cevat İzgi records the title as al-Tajnis fi al-ḥisāb. See: Cevat İzgi, Osmanlı Medreselerinde İlim, vol. 1 (İstanbul: İz, 1997), 245–46.”
25. This entry is in Krause (1936, 492); Qurbānī (1986/87, 444–45); and Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu (2003, 116). Şen and Fleischer list the entry under “al-Ṭabarī, Abū Ja‘far Muḥammad b. Ayyūb b. Ḥāsib (d.?).”
26. This author is listed in Krause (1936, 492) and Qurbānī (1986/87, 307) for a different work, but in Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu (2003, 207) for the title given above (I. 26). Şen and Fleischer list the entry under “al-Zanjānī, ‘Abd al-Wahhāb Ibrāhīm (fl. thirteenth century)” without the part “Izz al-Dīn.”
27. Şen and Fleischer list this entry under “al-Zanjānī.”
28. Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu (2003, 207) refer to a source where this work (M7) is identified with M1 (entry I.26 above). Şen and Fleischer list this entry under “al-Zanjānī.”

29. Krause (1936, 494–505, 499); Qurbānī (1986/87, 486–505, 495–98); Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu (2003, 211–19, 212). Şen and Fleischer list this entry under “al-Ṭūsī, Naşīr al-Dīn Abū Ja’far Muḥammad b. Muḥammad (d. 1274).”
30. Krause (1936, 462) list the work under Ahwazi, not dated; Qurbānī (1986/87, 75–77) under “Abu al-Ḥasan Ahwāzī, dated 2nd half of fourth [=tenth] century, and possibly the first quarter of fifth century [=eleventh] century”; Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu (2003, 80) under Ahmad Ahwazi, preceded by Abu al-Ḥusayn, dated 10th c. Şen and Fleischer list it under “al-Ahwāzī, Ahmād b. al-Ḥusayn al-Kātib (d.?).”
31. Krause (1936, 507–8, no. 6); Qurbānī (1986/87, 351–54, no. 1); Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu (2003, 233–35, M3). Şen and Fleischer list it under “al-Shirāzī, Quṭb al-Dīn Maḥmūd b. Mas’ūd b. Muşliḥ (d. 1311).”
32. Krause (1936, 466); Qurbānī (1986/87, 154–69: 388 [= 998]); Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu (2003, 96–98). Şen and Fleischer list it under “al-Būzjānī, Abū al-Wafā’ Muḥammad b. Muḥammad b. Yahyā (d. 997 or 998).” On the tradition of this book in Arabic and Persian and some folios of its manuscript in Istanbul, see Elaheh Kheirandish, “An Early Tradition in Practical Geometry: The Telling Lines of Unique Arabic and Persian Sources,” in The Arts of Ornamental Geometry: A Persian Compendium on Similar and Complementary Interlocking Figures, Studies and Sources in Islamic Art and Architecture: Supplements to Muqarnas 13, ed. Gülru Necipoğlu (Leiden, 2017), 79–144.
33. This text is an Arabic version of Apollonius’s Conics, whose seven books (maqāla) survive in different manuscripts. One of these versions carries the name of “Banū Mūsā,” fl. ca. 860s (?), the three brothers who wrote and supported scientific works in ninth-century Baghdad: see Qurbānī (1986/87, 147–53, 151: no. 3); Krause (1936, 448–49) has an entry on the author excluding this work; Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu (2003, 34–36) include two versions naming one or more brothers: M1, M7. Şen and Fleischer list this text without any reference to the Banū Mūsā, placing it under “Apollonius of Perga (early second century BCE).”
34. Krause (1936, 474–79, no. 3): Fī Shakl Banī Mūsā; Qurbānī (1986/87, 47–52), d. 430 [=1038/39], no. 24; Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu (2003, 131–38: M12). Şen and Fleischer list it under “Ibn al-Haytham, Abū ‘Alī al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥasan (d. ca. 1040).” The dates of Ibn al-Haytham must be adjusted to “d. after ca. 432 [=1040/41]” in the light of evidence provided by A. I. Sabra, The Optics of Ibn al-Haytham, vol. 2, xxiii. See also above III. 2.
35. The author of this text is specified in the inventory as “Abū al-Ḥusayn.” He is identified as ‘Abd al-Malik b. Muḥammad in Şen and Fleischer’s list of entries, under “Apollonius of Perga (early second century BCE).” [Abū al-Ḥusayn ‘Abd al-Malik b. Muḥammad] Taşaffuḥ, 331 {8}, where its manuscript is cited as “TSMK A. 3463 (Karatay: A 6995).”
36. Qurbānī (1986/87, 92–98) notes that “Abū al-Faṭḥ Muḥammad ibn Qāsim ibn Faḍl İsfahānī, alive and active in 513 [=1119/20], completed Talkhīṣ al-makhrūṭāt in 513 [1119/20]”; Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu (2003, 174) mention “Muḥmūd ibn Muḥammad ibn Qāsim..., 12th c.” Şen and Fleischer identify the author as “al-İsfahānī, Abū al-Faṭḥ Muḥammad b. Qāsim b. Faḍl (d.?).” In my entry above under II. 4.4, the author’s name and dates are taken from David Pingree, “Abu’l-Fath Esfahani,” Encyclopædia Iranica, 1/3, 1983, 284–85.
37. The dates of this author are given by Qurbānī (1986/87, 285) as “alive in 675 [=1276/75]” and by Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu (2003, 230) as “2nd half of 13th c.” Şen and Fleischer identify him as “al-Samarqandī, d. 1302.”
38. The dates of this author are given by Qurbānī (1986/87, 342–45) as “d. ca. 840 [=1436/37]”; by Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu (2003, 272–74) as “ca. 1440.” Şen and Fleischer identify the author as “Qāḍizāde al-Rūmī, d. after 1440.” The text “1a. Sharḥ ashkāl al-ta’āsīs, Arabic, 327 {12–14}” is translated as “Commentary on al-Samarqandī’s Compendium of Geometry,” and followed by the edition noted under II.5.1 above. In that entry, the author’s full name and death date are adopted from F. Jamil Ragep, “Qāḍizāde al-Rūmī: Şalāḥ al-Dīn Mūsā ibn Muḥammad ibn Maḥmūd al-Rūmī,” in Thomas Hockey et al. (eds.), The Biographical Encyclopedia of Astronomers, Springer Reference (New York: Springer, 2007), 942.
39. The only modern source with an entry on this author is the list of Şen and Fleischer, who identify him as “Quṭb al-Dīn Çelebī, Muḥammad b. Muḥammad b. Mūsā Qāḍizāde (fl. late fifteenth century).” In my entry above under II. 5.3, the dates of this author are derived from A. Tashköprüzāde’s Al-Shaqā’iq al-nu’māniyya fī ‘ulamā’ al-dawlat al-‘uthmāniyya, ed. Ahmed Subhi Furat (Istanbul: Üniversitesi, Edebiyat Fakültesi Yayınları, 1985), 327–28. On Miram Çelebī see İhsan Fazlıoğlu, “Miram Çelebī: Maḥmūd ibn Quṭb al-Dīn Muḥammad ibn Muḥammad ibn Mūsā Qāḍizāde,” in Thomas Hockey et al., eds., The Biographical Encyclopedia of Astronomers, Springer Reference (New York: Springer, 2007), 788–89, as well as n43 of my essay in this volume.

40. This author is dated in Qurbānī (1986/87, 421–30) as “d. ca. 405 [=1014/15]”; in Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu (2003, 102–5) as “10–11th c.” The former date is adopted in Şen and Fleischer.
41. This entry on the mathematical parts (riyāḍiyyāt) of Kitāb al-Shifā’ carrying the name of Ibn Sīnā in the inventory 351 {11.2} is listed in my entry II. 12 above under the same author with a death date of ca. 1036/37, after Qurbānī (1986/87, 29–34) and Rozenfeld-İhsanoğlu (2003, 122–27). Şen and Fleischer list it as “Anonymous.”
42. All the known manuscripts of Ibn al-Haytham’s Kitāb al-Manāẓir are currently in Istanbul, where two manuscripts under that title are reported in the inventory (359 {7, 7–8}; III.1, III.1.1). The latter copy is specified as being in “six volumes.” A copy of this text is wrongly reported to be in Tehran’s Millî Library: Muştafâ Dirâyâtî, Fihristvârah-i dastnvisht’hâ-yi Īrân (Dinâ) (Tehran: Kitābkhānah, Mûzih va Markaz-i Asnād-i Majlis-i Shurâ-yi Islāmî, 1389 [=2010]), 10:36. My personal examination showed it to be another copy of Kamal al-Din Fārisī’s Tanqīḥ al-Manāẓir, for which seventeen other copies are cited in the same catalogue: 3:374–75.
43. Copies of Fārisī’s Tanqīḥ al-Manāẓir in some Iranian libraries are listed chronologically in Dirâyâtî’s Fihristvârah 3 (1389 [=2010]), 374–75.
44. On a “Treatise on the Science of Optics” (Risāla fi ‘ilm al-Manāẓir) comparable to the one in this inventory titled Risālatu al-Manāẓiri, see my essay in this volume, especially n43.
45. This treatise carries the name of Qāḍizāde Rūmī in the inventory (361 {19}, 362 {1}), but the name of Mīram (or Mirem) Çelebî, his great grandson, is handwritten on the front page of an extant manuscript in Istanbul with that title: SK Ayasofya 2414. On the latter figure, see n. 42 of my essay in this volume.
46. Krause (1936, 458–60) gives no author date; Qurbānī (1986/87, 348–50) lists the death date as “300 [=912–13]”; Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu (2003, 59–60) state “d. ca. 910.” Şen and Fleischer list the author as “Qusṭā b. Lūqā al-Ba‘labakkī (d. ca. 912–13).”
47. Krause (1936, 491); Rozenfeld and İhsanoğlu (2003, 201–2). Şen and Fleischer do not have an entry on the author or text.
48. This anonymous text is translated in Şen and Fleischer as “Persuasive Argument on Arithmetic Calculation of Distance,” Arabic, fifteenth century, 334 {7}, with the edition as “İhsan Fazlıoğlu, Uygulamalı Geometrinin Tarihine Giriş: El-İkna fi ilmi’l-misaha (Istanbul: Dergah, 2004).”

BOOKS ON LOGIC (MANṬIḤ) AND DIALECTICS (JADAL)

The ordering of subjects in the palace library inventory prepared by ‘Atufi seems to reflect a general sense of rank. Logic and dialectics appear toward the end of the inventory, suggesting that they were ranked relatively low. Nevertheless, these disciplines were regularly studied in Ottoman colleges (madrasas). The cataloguer ‘Atufi himself contributed to them, writing a commentary on Īsāghūjī (Introduction), the standard introductory handbook on logic by Athir al-Din al-Abhari (d. 1265).¹ Ottoman palace slaves (the kapıkulu) were also taught logic, and it is explicitly for the education of this group that a Turkish work on logic dedicated to Sultan Bayezid II and entitled Zübdet ül-beyān (The Cream of Exposition) was written. (More on this work below.)

The inventory features 116 entries in the section devoted to books on logic (manṭiq) and dialectics (jadal). These appear in no discernable order. ‘Atufi will usually provide an abbreviated title, but on a few occasions he gives a title in full, and on some occasions he does not give a title at all, simply writing, for example, “a treatise on logic” or “a commentary on a book on logic” or “a Persian book on logic.” Authors are usually identified in abbreviated form (for example, Sa’d al-Din for Sa’d al-Din Mas’ud al-Taftazani), sometimes in fuller form (Sa’d al-Din al-Taftazani), and sometimes not at all. There is little consistency in the way a work is listed. For example, ‘Atufi has four entries for the commentary by Qutb al-Din al-Razi on the handbook Maṭālī’ al-anwār (The Dawning of Lights) by Siraj al-Din al-Urmawi (d. 1283). The first entry reads “Commentary on the Maṭālī’ by al-Qutb al-Razi”; the second, “Commentary on the Maṭālī’ by Qutb al-Din”; the third gives the full title of the commentary but without any indication of the author: Lawāmi’ al-asrār fī sharḥ Maṭālī’ al-anwār (The Blazing Secrets in Commenting upon the Dawning of Lights); the fourth entry has “The Commentary on the Logic of Maṭālī’ al-anwār, entitled Lawāmi’ al-asrār,” again with no indication of the author.

To take another example, ‘Atufi has four entries on the same Qutb al-Din al-Razi’s commentary on another handbook of logic, al-Risāla al-Shamsiyya (The Epistle for Shams al-Din) by Najm al-Din al-Katibi (d. 1276). The first three entries, which appear close together in the list, are given as “Commentary on the Shamsiyya entitled The Sea of Principles (Baḥr al-qawā’id) by Qutb al-Din,” which is inaccurate, for the title of Qutb al-Din’s commentary is actually “An Explication of the Principles” (Tahrīr al-qawā’id). The fourth entry for this work is simply given as “The Commentary on the Shamsiyya by Qutb al-Din.”

‘Atufi indicates at the end of each brief entry whether the work is “on logic” or “on dialectics,” and on a handful of occasions he uses the phrase min qibali al-manṭiq or min qibali al-jadal (i.e., “pertaining to logic or dialectics”), perhaps when the topic treated in a work does not belong to one discipline in a clear-cut manner. For example, a treatise on the impermissibility of circularity in the acquisition of knowledge (fī imtinā’ al-dawr fī l-iktisāb) and a treatise on “knowledge and discourse” (‘ilm wa-nuṭq) are described as min qibali al-manṭiq, presumably because the topics could also have been treated in a work on theology (kalām). Similarly, a treatise written in defense of the position that a particular (as opposed to a universal) cannot be the predicate (maḥmūl) of a proposition is described as min qibali al-manṭiq, presumably because the same issue could have been discussed within the science of semantics and rhetoric (‘ilm al-ma’ānī wa l-bayān).

A few entries include works that are not on the subject of logic at all. Most of these are the result of a manuscript in which multiple works are bound together, only some of which focus on logic. On a few occasions, a work is misclassified. 'Atufi lists a "treatise with queries concerning the two books of the Imam that are entitled al-Ma'ālim (Landmarks)" (Risālat al-as'ila al-mūrada 'alā naw'ayyi kitābi al-Imāmi al-mawsūmi bi-al-Ma'ālim). This is almost certainly identical to a similarly titled manuscript in the Topkapı Palace Library (Ahmet III 3426) that has the seal of Sultan Bayezid II. The manuscript contains the objections written by Najm al-Din al-Katibi (d. 1276) on the works al-Ma'ālim fi uṣūl al-dīn (Landmarks in Theology) and al-Ma'ālim fi uṣūl al-fiqh (Landmarks in Jurisprudence) by Fakhr al-Din al-Razi (d. 1210).² Neither Razi's works nor Katibi's objections can reasonably be classified as pertaining to logic or dialectics. It appears that the opening discussion of knowledge ('ilm), conception (taṣawwur), and assent (taṣdīq) misled either the cataloguer or the source he was following, since works on logic typically began in this fashion. Also, a work by the Egyptian scholar Shams al-Din al-Dalaji (d. 1540) is classified as being on logic, even though it only has a very short introductory chapter on logic, whereas the bulk of it is an abridgement of another work on philosophical theology (kalām) by the fourteenth-century Timurid scholar Sa'd al-Dīn al-Taftazani.³

If a work is in Persian or Turkish, 'Atufi indicates this; the default option is clearly that a work on logic or dialectics has been written in Arabic.

In what follows, the logic works included in the list will be discussed first, the works on dialectic second, and finally some concluding observations will be made.

LOGIC

The works on logic can be grouped broadly into the following categories:

Post-Avicennan Summas of Logic

These are extensive works devoted solely to logic. The MS Török F. 59 list includes the major summas of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries:

- al-Baṣā'ir al-naṣīriyya (The Insights for Nasir al-Din) by 'Umar b. Sahlan al-Sawi (fl. 1127); three copies are listed.
- al-Manṭiq al-kabīr (The Long Logic) attributed to Fakhr al-Din al-Razi (d. 1210).⁴
- Kashf al-asrār (The Disclosure of Secrets) by Afdal al-Din al-Khunaji (d. 1248); two copies are listed, as well as a copy of the commentary on the work by Najm al-Din al-Katibi (d. 1276).
- Asās al-iqtibās (The Principle of Acquisition) by Nasir al-Din al-Tusi (d. 1274); nine copies are listed.
- Jāmi' al-daqa'iq (The Collected Subtleties) by Najm al-Din al-Katibi (d. 1276).
- Qistās al-afkār (The Measure of Thoughts) by Shams al-Din al-Samarqandi (d. 1322) with the author's own commentary; three copies are listed.

It is particularly noteworthy that there are nine copies of Tusi's summa Asās al-iqtibās in the inventory. All of these copies are indicated as being in Persian, implying that they are not copies of the Arabic translation prepared by Molla Hüsrev (d. 1480) and dedicated to Sultan Mehmed II.⁵ The number of copies of the work is unexpected and suggests that it was popular among the users of the library, perhaps primarily scribes and palace pages (kapıkulu) who might have found Persian more accessible than Arabic. Apart from being written in Persian, Tusi's work is also unusual in that it retains an archaic feature that makes it quite different from the standard works on logic that were taught and studied in Ottoman madrasas: Its material is arranged in accordance with the books of the old Peripatetic Organon, rather than being divided into two main parts dealing with conceptions (taṣawwurāt) and assents (taṣdīqāt), as was typical of later post-Avicennian logicians.⁶ Ottoman ulama who wrote on logic from the fifteenth century to the eighteenth appear not to have been particularly influenced by Tusi's summa.

Handbooks on Logic and Their Commentaries (shurūḥ) and Glosses (ḥawāshī)

MS Török F. 59 also lists multiple copies of the standard logic handbooks taught in Ottoman colleges (and colleges in the Turco-Persianate world in general).⁷ At the introductory level, the standard handbook was al-Abhari's aforementioned Īsāghūjī, usually studied with the commentary of Husam al-Din al-Kati (d. 1359) or the more demanding commentary of Molla Fenari (d. 1431). The inventory includes three copies of the former commentary, and two copies of the latter.

At the intermediate level, the standard handbook was al-Risāla al-Shamsiyya (The Epistle for Shams al-Din) by Najm al-Din al-Katibi (d. 1276). The inventory includes three copies of the commentary on this handbook by Sa'd al-Din al-Taftazani (d. 1390) and four copies of the commentary by Qutb al-Din al-Razi (d. 1365). It also includes single copies of each of the commentaries by Ibn al-Mutahhar al-Hilli (d. 1325), Mirek Ibn Mubarakshah (fl. 1355), and Musannifek (d. 1470); the last of these is in Persian.

At the advanced level, a widely studied handbook was Maṭālī' al-anwār (The Dawning of Lights) by Siraj al-Din al-Urmawi (d. 1283). The inventory includes two copies of the commentary by Shams al-Din al-Isfahani (d. 1348) and four copies of the commentary by Qutb al-Din al-Razi (d. 1365). There are also seven copies of the gloss on Qutb al-Din's commentary by al-Sayyid al-Sharif al-Jurjani (d. 1413). There are three copies of the Persian translation of Qutb al-Din's commentary by 'Ala' al-Din al-Tusi (d. 1482).

The Logic Sections of Philosophical Summas

The list of works on logic also includes general philosophical summas that devote sections to logic. Examples include:

- Two copies of the logic books of al-Shifā' (The Healing) by Avicenna (d. 1037), and a copy of the Book on Demonstration (Burhān) from the same work.
- Two copies of Dānishnāme-yi 'Alā' (The Book of Science for 'Ala' al-Dawla), a Persian compendium of philosophy by Avicenna.
- al-Mu'tabar (The Considered View) by the Jewish philosopher Abu l-Barakat al-Baghdadi (d. 1152). The copy is listed as consisting of four volumes.
- A manuscript with the logic section of al-Mashārī' wa l-muṭārahāt (Sources and Exchanges), a lengthy presentation of philosophy by the "Illuminationist" (i.e., anti-Peripatetic Platonist) philosopher Yahya al-Suhrawardi (d. 1191).
- A copy of al-Muqāwamāt (Firm Standings), a shorter presentation of logic and philosophy by Suhrawardi.
- A copy of al-Mulakhkhaṣṣ (The Epitome) on logic, metaphysics, physics, and theology by Fakhr al-Din al-Razi (d. 1210). Other copies of this work, as well as later commentaries on it, are listed in the preceding section of 'Atufi's inventory, on "Islamic philosophy" (al-hikma al-islāmiyya).
- The logic section of Hidāyat al-hikma (The Guidance of Philosophy) by Athir al-Din al-Abhari (d. 1265). This work was a widely studied introduction to physics and metaphysics in the Turco-Persianate world. It originally included a first section on logic as well, but this fell into disuse in later centuries and was rarely covered by later commentators.⁸ There are two entries explicitly stating that the manuscripts include both the logic part (manṭiq al-Hidāya, al-Hidāya fī l-manṭiq) and philosophy parts of the work (ḥikmat al-Hidāya). There are many more copies of the work, along with copies of the numerous commentaries on it, in the subsequent section on "Philosophy in the falsafa tradition" (al-hikma al-falsafiyya).
- Bayān al-ḥaqq (The Exposure of the Truth) by Siraj al-Din al-Urmawi (d. 1283), a summa of logic and metaphysics. Three copies of this work are listed, as well as three copies of a commentary on the logic part of the work by a certain Amin al-Din al-Salimi.⁹ The relative popularity of the work may reflect the fact that Urmawi settled and died in Konya, and his works may therefore have been particularly widely copied and studied in Anatolia and Rumelia.¹⁰
- A copy of al-Asrār al-khaṭiyya fī l-'ulūm al-'aqliyya (The Hidden Secrets of the Rational Sciences) by the Shi'ite scholar Ibn al-Mutahhar al-Hilli (d. 1325), a summa of logic, physics, and metaphysics, is listed in the section on logic and dialectics. Another copy appears in the preceding section on "Islamic philosophy."

It is not always clear why these works appear in the logic section of the inventory. Why, for example, do al-Mu'tabar by Abu l-Barakat al-Baghdadi and al-Muqāwamāt by al-Suhrawardi appear in the section devoted to works on logic, whereas Avicenna's al-Ishārāt wa l-tanbīhāt (Pointers and Reminders) and its numerous commentaries, as well as Suhrawardi's al-Tawḥīdāt (Intimations) and Hikmat al-ishrāq (The Philosophy of Illumination) with their commentaries only appear in the subsequent section on “Philosophy in the falsafa tradition”? All of the works mentioned have an opening section on logic, followed by presentations of physics and metaphysics. There is no apparent reason to classify some of these works as logical works and others as philosophical works.

Pre-Avicennan Works

There are only a handful of listings of logical works from pre-Avicennan authors, a clear testimony to the powerful influence of Avicenna on the later Islamic tradition of logic. A notable entry here is the valuable copy of al-Farabi’s Long Commentary on Aristotle’s De Interpretatione, erroneously listed as a commentary on “Aristotle’s book on logical syllogisms.” Copied in 538 (1143), it is still extant in the Topkapı Palace Library.¹¹ Another early work is listed as “The Book of Aristotle translated into Arabic by Ishaq b. Hunayn on logic.” This is probably identical with another manuscript in the Topkapı Palace Library (A. 3362), which has the seal of Sultan Bayezid II and includes the translation by Hunayn b. Ishaq of Porphyry’s Eisagōgē and Aristotle’s Categories, De Interpretatione, Prior Analytics, and Posterior Analytics.¹²

Treatises on Specific Topics

There are in addition numerous treatises on specific topics related to logic. The inventory includes, for example, two entries on a “Treatise on the Fourth Figure” (Risāla fi l-shakl al-rābi). This is presumably the treatise defending the fourth figure of the syllogism by Najm al-Din Ibn al-Sari (d. 1153), studied by Abdelhamid Sabra in a pioneering article from 1965.¹³ Many of the listed treatises are by the aforementioned fourteenth-century scholar Qutb al-Din al-Razi, who also wrote the standard commentaries on the logic handbooks of Katibi and Urmawi. There are four copies of his treatise on universals (kulliyāt) and two of his treatise on conception and assent (taṣawwur wa-taṣdīq).

Exclusions

It may be instructive to supplement this brief overview with some observations on what is not included in the section of works on logic. As already noted, there are precious few logical works by authors predating Avicenna. There are also no logical works by authors from Islamic Spain or the Maghreb. For example, the annotations on al-Farabi’s logical works by Ibn Baja/Avempace (d. 1138) and the commentaries on Aristotle’s logical works by Ibn Rushd/Averroes (d. 1198) are absent. By the late fifteenth century, the Maghreb had its own tradition of post-Avicennan logic, represented by the works of Muhammad al-Sharif al-Tilimsani (d. 1370), Ibn ‘Arafa (d. 1401), Ibn Marzuq al-Hafid (d. 1439), and Muhammad b. Yusuf al-Sanusi (d. 1490), for example. These are also not to be found in the collection.¹⁴ The list of works in the MS Török F. 59 collection is almost exclusively oriented toward the eastern, Persianate tradition of logic.

More surprisingly, there are no references to the later handbook by the eminent Timurid scholar Sa’d al-Din al-Taftazani (d. 1390) entitled Tahdhīb al-manṭiq (The Condensation of Logic). Nor does the list include any of the numerous later commentaries on this work. Especially the commentary by the Persian scholar Jalal al-Din al-Dawani (d. 1502) came to be widely studied in Ottoman scholarly circles in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries and elicited numerous glosses by Ottoman scholars. The absence of this work, as well as other works by Dawani, is somewhat puzzling in light of the fact that he dedicated a number of works to Bayezid II.¹⁵

DIALECTICS

The works on dialectics (jadal) included in the inventory all belong to the tradition going back to the Central Asian scholar Rukn al-Din al-‘Amidi (d. 1218).¹⁶ This tradition was distinct from, though influenced by, both the earlier juridical and theological traditions of eristic and the Aristotelian tradition of the Topics. Unlike earlier juristic and theological works on jadal, ‘Amidi’s tradition was topic-neutral and incorporated formal propositional logic from the discipline of logic. A notable entry is a manuscript that contains the following three seminal works in this tradition:¹⁷

- Rukn al-Din al-‘Amidi (d. 1218): al-Irshād (The Guide)
- Athir al-Din al-Abhari (d. 1265): al-Qawāḍiḥ al-jadaliyya (Dialectical Confutations)

– Burhan al-Din al-Nasafi (d. 1288): al-Fuṣūl (Maxims)

By the end of the fifteenth century, the standard handbook of dialectics in this tradition—by then often termed ‘ilm al-munāẓara (the science of disputation) or ādāb al-baḥṭh (the rules of discussion)—was a short treatise by Shams al-Din al-Samarqandi (d. 1322). ‘Atufi’s list includes the standard commentaries on this work by Muhammad al-Bihishti (d. 1348), Qutb al-Din al-Gilani (fl. 1420), and Mas‘ud al-Shirwani (d. 1499).

Surprisingly, there are no works from the earlier tradition of juristic and theological jadal—for example, the classic works of al-Baji (d. 1081), al-Juwayni (d. 1085), al-Ghazali (d. 1111), and al-Barawi (d. 1171)—that had been influential in Maliki and Shafi‘i circles in the Arabic-speaking world.

CONCLUDING OBSERVATIONS

A remarkable fact is that ‘Atufi’s list includes a conspicuously low number of works on logic and dialectic by Ottoman scholars. Exceptions are the two copies of Molla Fenari’s commentary on Īsāghūjī, as well as a work entitled Zūbdat ūl-beyān (The Cream of Exposition) that is described by ‘Atufi simply as a work “in Turkish.” Thanks to a study by Havva Kızılçardak, it is known that the author was a certain Mehmed Ladiki, who dedicated his work to Sultan Bayezid II and stated in the introduction that he had written it for the education of the kapıkulu class.¹⁸ These are three entries out of 116.

To be sure, the category “Ottoman scholar” still had porous boundaries in the fifteenth century. Should it include, for example, ‘Ali al-‘Ajami (d. 1456), Musan-nifek (d. 1470), or ‘Ala’ al-Din al-Tusi (d. 1482), three scholars who were born and educated in Iran but who spent some or all of their later years in the Ottoman realm? If we consider such scholars to be “Ottoman,” then of course the number of works by “Ottoman scholars” would increase somewhat.

Nevertheless, there is a way to rephrase the point I have made without getting entangled in discussions about who was and who was not an Ottoman scholar. Someone who only had access to the list of works on logic and dialectics in ‘Atufi’s inventory, with no contextual information except that it is a list of the holdings of a library, would be able to conclude with some confidence that the library was in the Turco-Persian cultural area, rather than, say, in North Africa. But it would be very difficult to determine whether the library was in Istanbul or, for example, in Tabriz, Shiraz, Herat, or Bukhara. Even the two copies of Fenari’s commentary on Abhari’s Īsāghūjī would not be a decisive clue, for this was a work that was also studied and glossed beyond the Ottoman borders, for example in Azeri areas to the east and in the Tatar areas north of the Black and Caspian Seas.¹⁹ The presence of an unidentified work on logic “in Turkish” would of course not have been decisive, either, for such a work could also have been written in Azerbaijan, Herat, or Central Asia.

By contrast, if someone were to see a bare list of works on logic in the present-day Topkapı Library (for example, a list extracted from Karatay’s modern catalogue of Arabic works on logic in that library) the Ottoman nature of the collection would be easy to determine.²⁰ That list would include numerous works on logic and dialectics by Ottoman scholars—works that were widely studied in the Turkish-speaking areas of the empire but that were not well known further east, in Iran, India, or Central Asia. Examples are works by ‘Allamek Bosnavi (d. 1636), Hüseyin Adanavi (fl. 1660), Kara Halil Tirevi (d. 1711), Es‘ad Yanyavi (d. 1729), Mehmed Saçaqlı-zade (d. 1732), Ebu Sa‘id Hadimi (d. 1762), and Isma‘il Gelenbevi (d. 1791).²¹ It is clear that the formation of a distinct Ottoman tradition of logic and dialectics occurs in the period after the compilation of ‘Atufi’s palace library inventory.

- Schmidtke and R. Pourjavady (Berlin and Tehran: Institute of Islamic Studies and Iranian Institute of Philosophy, 2007). The editors have not used the Topkapı manuscript.
3. Two copies of Dalajī's work, entitled Sharḥ Jannat abkār al-aḥkār (Commentary on the Paradise of Novel Thoughts), are now extant in the Süleymaniye Library in Istanbul. See Istanbul, SK Laleli MS 2170 and Ayasofya MS 2545.
 4. This appears to be the sole extant copy of this massive work. It is in the Topkapı Palace Library; see Karatay, nr. 6782. The attribution to Razi is not beyond doubt.
 5. There are two extant copies of Molla Hüsrev's Arabic translation in the Topkapı Palace Library today (Karatay, nrs. 6812, 6813), and these bear the seal of Sultan Bayezid II, so it is likely that 'Atufi missed the fact that some of the copies of Asās al-iqtibās were not in Persian but in Arabic.
 6. Naşir al-Dīn Tūsī, Asās al-iqtibās, ed. Mudarris Razavī (Tehran 1326/1947).
 7. A sense of the standard handbooks of logic in the early sixteenth century can be gathered from the autobiographical account of the Ottoman scholar and judge Aḥmed Ṭāşköprüzāde (1495–1561); see his al-Shaqā'iq al-Nu'māniyya fī 'ulamā' al-dawlah al-'Uthmāniyya, ed. Sayyid Muḥammad Ṭabāṭabā'ī Bihbihānī (Tehran: Kitābkhāne Mūzih va Markaz-i Asnād, Majlis-i Shūrā-yi Islāmī, 2010), 471–77. In logic, Ṭāşköprüzāde studied Abharī's Īsāghūjī with the commentary of Ḥusām al-Dīn al-Kātī, Kātībī's al-Shamsiyya (The Epistle for Shams al-Din) with the commentary of Quṭb al-Dīn al-Rāzī, and al-Sayyid al-Sharīf al-Jurjānī's gloss on Quṭb al-Dīn al-Rāzī's commentary on Urmawī's Maṭālī' al-anwār (The Dawning of Lights).
 8. The widely copied commentaries on the work by Mawlana Zade al-Kharziyāni (d. 1409), Muḥammad Ibn al-Sharīf (d. 1424), Qadī Mir Husayn al-Maybudī (d. 1504), and Mulla Sadra al-Shirāzī (d. 1635) skip the logic section of Abharī's handbook.
 9. For another work by this obscure author, see Karatay nr. 6730: a copy of his lengthy commentary on Abharī's Hidāyat al-ḥikma (The Guidance of Philosophy).
 10. On Urmawī, see Louise Marlow, "A Thirteenth-Century Scholar in the Eastern Mediterranean: Sirāj al-Dīn Urmawī, Jurist, Logician, Diplomat," Al-Masaq 22 (2010): 279–313.
 11. Karatay, nr. 6763. The manuscript is the basis of the edition prepared by W. Kutsch & S. Marrow (Beirut: Imprimerie catholique, 1960).
 12. Karatay, nr. 6643.
 13. A. I. Sabra, "A Twelfth Century Defense of the Fourth Figure of the Syllogism," Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes 28 (1965): 14–28. Sabra used a manuscript in the Süleymaniye Library in Istanbul (Ayasofya MS 4830).
 14. A copy of Sanusi's commentary on Ibn 'Arafa's Epitome (Mukhtaṣar) on logic is extant in the Topkapı Palace Library (Karatay, nr. 6889), but the manuscript dates from 1120 (1708).
 15. On Dawanī and his works, see Reza Pourjavady, Philosophy in Early Safavid Iran (Leiden: Brill, 2011), 4–16. For later Ottoman glosses on his commentary on Tahdhīb al-mantiq (The Condensation of Logic), see Rudolf Mach, Catalogue of Arabic Manuscripts (Yahuda Section) in the Garrett Collection, Princeton University Library (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1977), nrs. 3238–42.
 16. The North African historian Ibn Khaldun identified this school of dialectics in a brief survey of the field in his celebrated Muqaddima; see The Muqaddimah: An Introduction to History, trans. Franz Rosenthal, 3 vols. (New York: Pantheon Books, 1958), 3:33. For a survey of the evolution of dialectics in Arabic, see Larry Miller, "Islamic Disputation Theory: A Study of the Development of Dialectic in Islam from the Tenth through the Fourteenth Centuries" (PhD diss., Princeton University, 1984).
 17. The current location of this manuscript is not known to me.

 19. Two widely studied glosses on the commentary were written by the Azeri scholar Kul Ahmed Şirvani (fl. sixteenth century) and the Tatar scholar Burhan al-Din Bulghari (fl. 1480s).

NOTES

1. Erroneously listed as “Fārābī’s commentary on Aristotle’s book on logical syllogisms.”
2. Manuscripts in bold bear the seal of Bayezid II.
3. The manuscript Carullah 1870 in the Süleymaniye Library titled Sharḥ al-Muqaddima al-Burhānīyya is attributed to Burhān al-dīn Ibrāhīm b. Yūsūf al-Bulghārī, and dated to 738 (1337).
4. Aḥmad b. ‘Umar al-Malikī is identified as the only commentator by Kātib Çelebī (p. 1921). According to Kātib Çelebī, al-Isfahānī’s work is named Nāẓirat al-‘ayn, and the commentary is titled Nāḍirat al-‘ayn (The Flourishing of the Essence). It is possible, however, that Kātib Çelebī was mistaken and that the only commentary is by al-Isfahānī himself.

PHILOSOPHICAL MANUSCRIPTS: TWO ALTERNATIVE PHILOSOPHIES

The distinctive and highly significant feature of the catalogue of philosophical manuscripts is their classification under two headings, al-ḥikma al-islāmiyya and al-ḥikma al-falsafiyya, both being distinct from that of the manuscripts on theology, ʿilm al-kalām, which is found in a separate and earlier section of the palace library inventory (see the article by Atçıl above). The cataloguer's title of the entire section on philosophical manuscripts reads Tafṣīl kutub al-ḥikma al-islāmiyya wa-kutub ʿilm al-jadal wa-kutub al-mantiq wa-kutub al-ḥikma al-falsafiyya,¹ or "Listing of books on Islamic philosophy, science of disputation (dialectic), logic, and philosophical philosophy" (339 {1–4}). There are several indicators here concerning the development and nomenclature of the sciences in the eastern Islamic world by the time of Bayezid II (r. 1481–1512).

The enormously influential philosophy of Avicenna (Ibn Sina, d. 1037) brought about a sea change in intellectual history and inaugurated a lengthy period of intense philosophical discussion by thinkers aiming to defend, revise, or reject his ideas.² The main factor generating this explosive reaction was that Avicenna's philosophy constituted a comprehensive, rationally justified, and internally self-consistent account of reality, a scientific system as a worldview that demanded, or necessitated, adherence. As such, it set itself up, or was seen as having set itself up, against other ideologies with contending worldviews, most notably the Islamic one based on the Qur'an and the sharī'a. Prior to Avicenna, the products of philosophers had consisted of treatises on discrete subjects and abstruse commentaries on the canonical philosophical texts, all of which were matters for specialists that could not and did not claim endorsement or allegiance from society as a whole; Avicenna's all-embracing scientific system did. As a result, it was not long before the two rival worldviews, the philosophical/Avicennan and the Islamic, were presented by adherents of the latter as being antithetical and utterly irreconcilable, whereas until that time such rivalries were normally discussed as alternative ideological and theoretical positions that found their place in society as a whole. Within slightly more than half a century after Avicenna's death, the theologian and jurist al-Ghazali (d. 1111) expressed conservative political ideologies that were occasioned by the incursion of the Saljuqs into the Middle East and their domination of the political scene as defenders of the Baghdad Caliphate against the encroaching heterodox Isma'ili Fatimids. He elevated the legal status of heterodoxy to a capital offense and excommunicated three philosophical positions as constituting unbelief (kufṛ), namely, "the eternity of the world, the denial of God's knowledge of particulars, and the denial of bodily resurrection,"³ effectively casting the philosophers in the same light as the Isma'ilis. In the following centuries, the best minds in the eastern Islamic world spent their energies in apologetic pursuits trying to accommodate Avicenna's scientific system within the Islamic paradigm. Avicenna's system could not be rejected wholesale—that would have been tantamount to idiocy by any self-respecting intellectual—but neither could its tenets that offended Islam's unnegotiable positions, as articulated by al-Ghazali, be maintained. Thus the scientific/philosophical system as a whole—which consisted of logic; the theoretical sciences of physics, mathematics, and metaphysics; and the practical sciences of ethics and politics—was fragmented, isolating the religiously offensive portions of metaphysics and some of the physics for special theological treatment, while the remaining parts of philosophy were now studied independently. Along with the fragmentation came a change in nomenclature. What was previously known as “philosophy” (ḥikma and falsafa), covering all of these fields, now became “the sciences” (al-‘ulūm). Logic (manṭiq) was dissociated from the rest, becoming an independent field, and it was also amplified with the development of such research methods as “dialectic” (jadāl) and “research methodology” (adab al-baḥṭh); ḥikma was restricted to the areas of physics and metaphysics (originally the bêtes noires of the religious) as these two fields were integrated into an Islamic framework; and the term falsafa alone remained to designate physics and metaphysics done in the Avicennan mode.

Against this background, the cataloguer’s categories in the philosophical section of the palace library inventory are seen to be based not on subject matter or field of inquiry, as in all other cases, but on the degree of adherence to Islamic doctrine. Works that were considered to defend or follow Islamic doctrine are categorized under ḥikma islāmiyya, and those that did not, or those that presented an account without reference to Islamic doctrine, are categorized under ḥikma falsafiyya. This is expressly stated by the cataloguer in a comment he inserted in his own hand⁴ between the lines of the title of the section covering all philosophy (given above in the first paragraph). Between the first and second line, and the words al-ḥikma al-islāmiyya (339 {9–10}) he adds, in his characteristic cursive hand, wa-hiya llatī yubḥathu fihā ‘alā qānūn al-shar‘ al-sharīf al-nabawī, that is, “[Islamic philosophy,] which is the one in which research is conducted in accordance with the rules of the noble Prophetic Law.” He inserts a similar comment in the section on Islamic theology, ‘ilm al-kalām (66 {1–2}). The catalogue entry is the following: Kitāb Durrat al-tāj fī l-ḥikma al-islāmiyya bi-l-fārisiyya min qibal ‘ilm al-kalām, or, “Item. The Crown Pearl [by Qutbaddin al-Shirazi, d. 1311] on Islamic philosophy, in Persian, [written] from the perspective of Islamic theology.” Under the word “Islamic,” he inserts the following comment between the lines: wa innamā qāla al-islāmiyya li-anna akthar mabāḥithihī shar‘iyyāt, or, “He [i.e., the cataloguer] said ‘Islamic’ [i.e., ‘Islamic’ rather than falsafiyya, ‘philosophical’] only because the majority of the subjects investigated pertain to Islamic law.” In each case the cataloguer tries to explain the categorization of the book(s) based on the criterion of adherence to Islamic doctrine.

So if we take the word ḥikma in ḥikma islāmiyya and ḥikma falsafiyya to refer to the particular disciplines of physics and metaphysics, the former can be understood as “Islamic physics and metaphysics,” and the latter as “philosophical physics and metaphysics.” Alternatively, if we take ḥikma to refer to the field of philosophy in general, the former would be “Islamic philosophy,” and the latter, “philosophical philosophy,” which would mean, actually, “non-Islamic philosophy,” or, if we want to use anachronistically modern concepts, “secular philosophy,” or even “scientific philosophy.” Thus the entry on 356 {10–11} reads, Matn al-Hidāya li-Athīraddīn fī l-manṭiq wa-l-ḥikma al-falsafiyya, “The text [as opposed to a commentary on the text] of The Guidance [in/of Philosophy] by Athīraddīn [al-Abhari, d. 1264] on Logic and on Philosophical Physics and Metaphysics,” whereas the entry on 339 {9–10} reads, Matn Mulaḥḥaṣ al-Imām al-Rāzī fī l-manṭiq wa-l-ḥikma al-islāmiyya, “The Text of The Digest by [Fakhraddīn] al-Rāzī [d. 1210] on Logic and on Islamic Physics and Metaphysics.”

A prominent characteristic of the classification technique used by the cataloguer is that he actively announces his criteria for listing a work under this or that category, usually with the formula min qibal followed by the category he selects, right after the title of the work he cites. The expression min qibal, here used beyond its customary function, is intended to specify the scholarly field to which a work pertains and the perspective from which it was written. It thus practically means a work “written from the perspective of” or, more specifically, “written following the method or doctrine of.” This distinction is deemed necessary when the title in question may easily be perceived as pertaining to a related field and might thus be miscatalogued. Books with astronomical content, for example, must be specified as pertaining to either astronomy (min qibal ‘ilm al-hay’a) or astrology (min qibal ‘ilm al-nujūm, or just min qibal al-nujūm).⁵ In the case of books with philosophical content, the expression is used to differentiate among three disciplines: Islamic theology (‘ilm al-kalām), Islamic philosophy (ḥikma islāmiyya), and “philosophical” philosophy (ḥikma falsafīyya), with the criterion being, as just mentioned, the degree of adherence to Islamic doctrine.

This constitutes what appears to be a novelty for this cataloguer, or at least for the intellectual tradition in which he was schooled and which he reflects. Theology (ʿilm al-kalām) and philosophy (falsafa and ḥikma) had clearly delineated boundaries in the period before Avicenna, and there was no question of their being confused. But after Avicenna's philosophical system came to dominate intellectual life in the eastern Islamic world, and following the efforts of a number of theologians, notably al-Ghazali and Fakhraddin al-Razi, to accommodate one to the other, the lines between the two disciplines tended to blur, as already recognized by Ibn Khaldun (d. 1406).⁶ By the time of Mehmed II (r. 1444–46, 1451–81), philosophy and theology were practically indistinguishable at the level of discourse (and presumably also in substance, though scholarship is only now beginning to sort this out), and added to these was yet a third discipline, the Ibn ʿArabi line of mysticism, which had fully adopted the methods of argumentation and terminology of the other two. The confusion is best illustrated—and documented—by Mehmed II himself, when he requested that the brilliant poet and scholar al-Jami (1414–92) should compose a treatise showing precisely how these three disciplines differ from each other. Al-Jami obliged, in a treatise entitled al-Durra al-fākhirā (The Precious Pearl), which took the form of an arbitration, or impartial judgment (muḥākama), among the three positions on the questions of God's existence and unity, his attributes, and the emanation of the world from him.⁷ In this astonishing text, the different positions of the three disciplines are expressed in a highly technical philosophical language and mode of argumentation that can hardly be differentiated on any formal level—especially when one compares this language with the language of theology and metaphysics before Avicenna—but only, if at all, on the basis of minute shifts of doctrinal content. As such, the philosophization of theology and mysticism at the discursive level becomes complete and justifies Mehmed II's puzzlement.

The problem persists to this day, with a considerable number of scholars seeing the post-Avicennan period as one of engagement in an all-embracing “philosophical theology.”⁸ However, the catalogue presents concrete evidence that discriminations did exist, and indeed to such an extent that they could provide the basis of differentiated classification. Not only does the cataloguer see theology (ʿilm al-kalām) as distinct from philosophy (falsafa and ḥikma), but he also introduces a further discrimination within philosophy itself, between Islamic and “philosophical” (or non-Islamic, secular) philosophy. There was thus a genuine effort by the cataloguer and the intellectual tradition in which he was educated to come to terms with the problem and try to differentiate among the three disciplines.

The question of what constituted the criteria of discrimination, however, will require further study. In general, it is clear, as already mentioned, that adherence to the main tenets of Islamic doctrine (primarily, one would suppose, the three subjects from which any deviation constituted unbelief, according to al-Ghazali) was the main discriminating factor between “Islamic philosophy” (ḥikma islāmīyya) and “philosophical philosophy” (ḥikma falsafīyya). But given the density and opacity of argumentation in all these works, discerning which book belonged to which category would not have been easy. And indeed, there are instances in the inventory where uncertainty and confusion can be observed. In the inventory section on philosophical manuscripts, Avicenna's treatise on eschatology known as The Provenance and Destination is in one place classified as “philosophical philosophy” (Risālat Ibn Sīnā fī l-Mabdaʾ wa-l-maʿād al-falsafī, 356 {8–9}), and in another place as “Islamic philosophy” (Risāla fī l-Mabdaʾ wa-l-maʿād ʿalā ṭarīqat al-ḥikma al-islāmīyya, 362 {7}). Similarly, al-Abhari's Kashf al-ḥaqāʾiq is listed as belonging to both “Islamic” and “philosophical philosophy” (fī l-manṭiq wa-l-ḥikma al-falsafīyya maʿa al-ḥikma al-islāmīyya, 339 {18–19}). Furthermore, there was at times uncertainty as to whether a work belonged to theology proper (ʿilm al-kalām) or “Islamic philosophy.” As we saw above, the Persian Crown Pearl by Qutbaddin al-Shirazi is listed in the section on Theology as having been written from the point of view of ʿilm al-kalām, despite the fact that it is characterized as being a work on “Islamic philosophy” (Kitāb Durrat al-tāj fī l-ḥikma al-islāmīyya bi-l-fārisīyya min qibal ʿilm al-kalām), thus betraying uncertainty about its proper subject. Indicating yet further oscillation is the cataloguer's interlinear comment that "He said 'Islamic' [i.e., 'Islamic' rather than falsafīyya, 'philosophical'] only because the majority of the subjects investigated belong to Islamic law" (wa innamā qāla al-islāmīyya li-anna akthar mabāḥithihī shar'īyyāt). The Durrat al-tāj therefore is seen as potentially belonging to all three categories: it could have been a work on "philosophical philosophy" on the basis of its chapters not dealing specifically with Islamic law, but it is listed as a work representing the point of view of "theology," even though by its contents as a whole it belongs to "Islamic philosophy." One might suppose that the fluidity, or uncertainty, of the categorization was artificial (and not based on the ambiguity of the contents themselves), insofar as the Turkish preface to the inventory mentions as a specific rule the fact that some books may be listed under two or more disciplines. Thus, if several manuscript copies of a single work were available, they would be catalogued under separate possible disciplines from which a reader might request them (see Appendix IV). However, the very fact that the same work could be requested under one of the three disciplines by itself indicates the fluidity of categorization in the minds of the requesting scholars themselves.

The sultan's orders to the cataloguer were "to classify every book according to its particular discipline,"⁹ a task which he duly performed. But of course it cannot be maintained that the cataloguer read every single book in these three categories—theology, Islamic philosophy, and philosophical philosophy—and that he was in a position fully to understand it so that he could establish the category to which each book belonged. It is clear that he gained his knowledge about how to classify these works from the tradition in which he was trained, where manifestly such discussions were conducted by the scholars and specific works were assigned to a particular category. The significance of the evidence provided by the inventory is thus that, certainly by the fifteenth century during which the cataloguer was born and educated, scholars were engaged in ascertaining the methods and contents of books on the broader subjects of theology and philosophy and further classifying them according to criteria they developed based on the adherence of the books to Islamic doctrine. They did not view all such authorial activity as an inchoate engagement in "philosophical theology" (as some modern scholars would have it), but discriminated among the genres with a view to approve or criticize certain titles, methods of inquiry, and approaches. The inventory thus gains an additional function as a catalogue raisonnée, serving to alert readers about the possible religious reprehensibility of some titles. This is not censure, and certainly not the Muslim version of the Roman Catholic Index Librorum Prohibitorum, but it prepares the ground for such a list should the occasion have arisen.

The religious watchdog aspect of the inventory becomes increasingly clear when it is noted that the cataloguer on occasion allows himself to intervene, as part of his description of a volume, going beyond the requirement to identify the discipline to which a book pertains, with his own critical comments after listing the titles of the works. These comments in the section on philosophical manuscripts are invariably critical of "philosophical philosophy," that is, non-Islamic philosophy. Al-Ghazali's notorious Tahāfut al-falāsifa (Precipitance of the Philosophers), for example, is additionally described as "invalidating philosophical philosophy" (fī ibtāl al-ḥikma al-falsafīyya). Furthermore, of the two major philosophers listed under "philosophical philosophy," Avicenna and Suhrawardi (d. 1191), some works by the latter are characterized as "leaning toward truth" (al-mā'ila ilā l-ḥaqq, 353 {2, 4–5, 6}), with the implication, first, that they do not represent but only approximate "truth" (Islamic doctrine), and second—and most importantly—that even so, they are better than the works of Avicenna which do not represent truth at all, since no such comment is made about any of them. The anonymous Ḥaqā'iq al-ḥalā'iq (The True Natures of Created Beings, 340 {11}) is described as being on the subject of "Islamic philosophy" and orthodoxy ("true knowledge," fī l-ḥikma al-islāmīyya wa l-ma'ārif al-ḥaqīqīyya), and al-Tahtani's (d. 1364) Arbitration between the Commentaries on Avicenna's al-Ishārāt wa-l-tanbihāt (Pointers and Reminders) is said to have been conducted on the basis of orthodox Islamic doctrine (al-Muḥākamāt bayna shurūḥ al-Ishārāt 'alā ṭarīqat al-ḥaqq min al-qawā'id al-islāmīyya, 340 {2–3}).

The next question concerns the identity and number of books listed under the three categories. The section on works of theology (kalām) presents nothing extraordinary. Although its holdings are not comprehensive, as Atçıl remarks in his essay above, it nevertheless contains major works in the field from the ninth century until the cataloguer's own lifetime, including texts and commentaries by Ottoman scholars manifestly used for education. The books listed under ḥikma islāmiyya and ḥikma falsafīyya, on the other hand, present a different picture. Those under the former heading, to begin with, are very few: they consist mainly of some works by Fakhraddin al-Razi, notably his Mulakhkhaṣ (Digest), with commentaries, and his commentary on Avicenna's Ishārāt (Pointers); along with al-Tahtani's Muḥākamāt (Arbitration); al-Abhari's Kashfal-ḥaqā'iq (Disclosure of Truths); al-Urmawi's (d. 1283) Maṭālī' al-anwār (Dawn of Lights) with his own commentary on it, Lawāmi' al-afkār (Brilliant Thoughts); al-Hilli's (d. 1325) al-Asrār al-khaṭīyya (Hidden Secrets); and two other unidentified treatises—all authors who lived within slightly more than a century of each other, the oldest being al-Razi (d. 1210) and the youngest al-Hilli (d. 1325), with no one else listed for the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. The cataloguer clearly does not identify any of the works that were composed during the two centuries before his compilation of the inventory, such as the works of al-Ijī and al-Jurjani, as pertaining to "Islamic philosophy," but rather lists them under theology.

The books listed under ḥikma falsafīyya are more numerous and present a slightly more varied picture, but one that is essentially analogous to the ḥikma islāmiyya category in that there are no works on this subject listed from the two centuries preceding the inventory: the youngest author included in the list who is not a commentator on Avicenna or Suhrawardi is Ibn Kammuna, who died in 1284. This section on "philosophical philosophy" is dominated by Avicenna (d. 1037), for whom there are listed thirty-seven works, together with their commentaries, along with numerous other unspecified treatises. Suhrawardi comes next as a distant second, with nine titles to his name, also with commentaries, and a few other unspecified treatises; followed by Ibn Kammuna, for whom are registered seven works, three with known titles and four unspecified. Other than Suhrawardi, Ibn Kammuna, and commentators, the rest are richly represented: they all the well-known names in eastern Islam from the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, each listed for the most part by his most famous book (see the names in the inventory below).

By contrast, philosophers from al-Andalus are completely absent, including Averroes (Ibn Rushd, d. 1198). Even Greek philosophers and philosophers in the east before Avicenna are sparsely represented. Plato has four titles, one of which is spurious, a second anonymous, the third may be related to the Republic, and only the fourth is the Timaeus. Surprisingly, Aristotle is very poorly represented, with just four titles, three of which are anonymous, and the fourth is claimed to be a commentary, also anonymous, on his Categories. Of the philosophers in early Islam, al-Kindi (d. after 866) has just one title; Hunayn b. Ishaq (d. 873) is represented by a fragment, it seems, from his gnomology on the anecdotes of the philosophers; the Ikhwan al-safa' (tenth century) have their epistles; and Miskawayh (d. 1030) has just two titles. The case with al-Farabi (d. 950–51) is interesting: although he is the best represented philosopher among this group with seven titles—as he should be, given his prominence in the history of philosophy in Islam—five of those titles nevertheless are anonymous, being mostly treatises in collective volumes (majmū'a) that 'Atufi did not bother to register singly by title; the sixth is a non-descript book on ethics; and only the seventh is a logic commentary on Aristotle's Prior Analytics, a field which al-Farabi covered thoroughly, both in quantity and quality.

All this indicates that in its first two centuries (1300 to 1500), Ottoman scholarship developed little interest in philosophical studies as an independent discipline or in its history and canonical texts, and only followed intellectual trends in the Iranian world from the Saljuqs onward, during the time when the new discipline of Islamic philosophy, with its decidedly religious outlook, was formulated and developed in contradistinction to the "philosophical" or secular philosophy of Avicenna. Ottoman scholars adopted this understanding of Islamic philosophy from their Iranian predecessors of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, along with the inimical attitude towards the philosophy of Avicenna as religiously reprehensible, evidenced by 'Atufi's critical comments. They accordingly showed little interest in the history of philosophy before Avicenna, and certainly no interest in philosophical developments in al-Andalus, which in any case had long ceased to exist by the time of Bayezid II. By contrast, the Safavids, who had newly organized as a state when 'Atufi was cataloguing, later developed an attitude toward philosophy that was inclusive of the works of pre-Avicenna authors, the Andalusians as represented by Averroes, and the ancient Greeks. On the basis of the evidence provided by this inventory, we might also investigate the attitude of Mehmed II concerning philosophy in the context of his well-known cultural policies, which included the copying of classical Greek works, the translation of others, and the commissioning of works on the assessment of religious and philosophical theses, such as the work by al-Jami mentioned above. Furthermore, 'Atufi's understanding of philosophical works as indicated by his cataloguing practices raises the question of the relationship between Mehmed II's policies on this subject and those of his son.¹⁰

The cataloguer's classification and listing of philosophical works thus offer prime evidence for the development of philosophy in the eastern Islamic lands after Avicenna. Avicenna's philosophy, which is massively represented in the extensive holdings in Bayezid II's library, was identified with philosophy as such, given the name "philosophical philosophy"—i.e., non-Islamic philosophy, since it was distinguished from "Islamic philosophy," understood to be conducted on the basis of Islamic principles—and criticized as not being conducive to, or representing, truth. Scholars after Avicenna engaged in attempts to fashion a philosophical approach that would avoid those aspects of his philosophy seen as being contrary to Islamic principles. These efforts, mostly represented in the work of Fakhraddin al-Razi,¹¹ generated a new discipline and a body of doctrinal content that has been called (by 'Atufi and some modern scholars) "Islamic philosophy," as distinct from Islamic theology ('ilm al-kalām). Works produced until the end of the thirteenth century were regarded as belonging to one or the other category, and it is clear that scholars had devised a set of criteria whereby the distinction could be made.¹² The cataloguer relies on this tradition to assign each philosophical work to its proper category, even if in some cases doubts persist. However, it also appears that both streams of philosophical activity, the "Islamic" and the "philosophical" (or non-Islamic), peter out by the end of the thirteenth century, as the cataloguer cannot identify any works in these areas from that time until his days. Presumably, then, "Islamic philosophy" eventually blends together with kalām, as the latter increasingly adopts philosophical terminology and argumentation for those parts of the subject that do not deal with specific Islamic doctrine and law (the shar'īyyāt), while philosophy proper just dies out, and henceforth philosophy is discussed only as a historical body of work, mainly the works of Avicenna, with no contemporary representatives of the discipline. References to philosophy and philosophers (usually to the "Peripatetics," al-mashshā'ūn) in theological works after the thirteenth century are to the frozen corpus of Avicenna's works.

Commentaries, supercommentaries, and glosses are listed under the title of the work on which they comment, and their authors are also listed separately, in alphabetical order, with a reference only to the author on whose work they comment. Under each author, the works are listed as follows: Integer numbers (1, 2, 3) indicate separate works by that author. Lowercase letters (a, b, c) indicate separate copies of the same work. Decimal numbers (.1, .2, .3) indicate separate commentaries on the original work by various commentators. A second decimal number after a first (.1.1, .1.2, .1.3) indicates a supercommentary on a commentary of the listed work. Lowercase Roman numerals in parentheses, (i), (ii), (iii), indicate that the MS contains only parts of the listed work, or is a translation of it.

Names of authors in square brackets [] indicate that the work in question is listed in the palace library inventory anonymously but that the author has been identified through its title.

References to standard reference works are: C. Brockelmann, Geschichte der arabischen Litteratur (Leiden, 1943–49) (henceforth, GAL, cited pages refer to the pages of the first edition listed in the margins of the second edition) and its Supplement (GALS); Ḥājjī Khalīfa, Kashf al-ẓunūn, ed. Ş. Yaltkaya and R. Bilge, 2 vols. (Istanbul, 1972); Encyclopaedia of Islam, 2nd ed. (Leiden, 1960–2004); the works of Ibn Sīnā are identified with a reference to their serial number in D. Gutas, Avicenna and the Aristotelian Tradition, 2nd ed. (Leiden 2014), Inventory at 411–558.

The authors and their works are listed alphabetically. The article, prepositions, and the words R[isāla], M[aqāla], and K[itāb] are disregarded in the alphabetization.

The Arabic titles of the books are translated in italics; descriptions of books in lieu of titles by the cataloguer are translated in Roman.

NOTES

1. See R. Wisnovsky, in Oriens 41 (2013): 369.
2. The titles are conflicting, though it seems hardly likely that Mawlānāzāde would have written three different commentaries on the Hidāya, if indeed he is the author of all of them. Most probably the Ḥaṣhiya is the work of Khojāzāde, studied by Emre Önal, Hocazade ve Ḥaṣhiya ala Ṣarḥ Hidayet al-Hikma Adl Eseri (master's thesis, Marmara Üniversitesi Sosyal Bilimler Enstitüsü, Istanbul, 2006), based on MS Süleymaniye Kütüphanesi, Yozgat, no. 720, fols. 89b–118a, dated 884, during the author's lifetime. The bewildering variety of commentaries, glosses, and supercommentaries on the Hidāya needs sorting out.
3. Anawati in the Encyclopaedia Iranica 1:216 gives the title as Jāmi' al-daqa'iq fi kashf al-ḥaqā'iq, though Brockelmann (GAL 1:467, no. VI) lists this as a work by al-Kātibī.
4. This title is not listed among the works inventoried by R. Pourjavady and S. Schmidtke, A Jewish Philosopher of Baghdad (Leiden, 2006).
5. This title is not listed as such in Pourjavady and Schmidtke (preceding note), though it may be the same as his Talkhīṣ al-ḥikma (no. 1.3.3).
6. Now edited by Ayman Shihadeh, Doubts on Avicenna (Leiden, 2016).
7. The entry reads Kitāb Muḥākamāt Qutb al-Milla wa-al-Dīn wa-Sharḥ al-Naṣīr al-Ṭūsī li-Kitāb al-Ishārāt fi al-ḥikma al-falsafiyya. When two or more independent works are bound in a single volume, the cataloguer records this as fi mujallad wāḥid, but not in this case, which might mean that the Qutbaddīn text follows the Ṭūsī text as lemmata.
8. This appears to be a description of the commentary in its opening lines, which has been taken by the cataloguer as its title.
9. It is noteworthy that the cataloguer (or the MS?), classifies this work in this entry as belonging to Islamic philosophy, not “philosophical” philosophy: R. fi al-Mabda' wa-al-ma'ād 'alā ṭarīqat al-ḥikma al-islāmiyya.
10. This is merely a bibliographer's description of the subject of the book and not a proper title. Shihadeh's inventory (note 5 above) of al-Mas'ūdī's works, 20–28, lists only two books on general philosophy, neither of which would appear to be this one.
11. The identity and dates of this scholar have yet to be properly established; Brockelmann (GAL 1:466, no. II 1a; 2:212, no. 1b [where the Hijra date 840 is a misprint for 740]; GALS 2:297, no. 1b) gives somewhat conflicting data, though they all seem to go back to H. Suter, Die Mathematiker und Astronomen der Araber und ihre Werke (Leipzig, 1900), no. 397.
12. The entry by M. Aminrazavi on Afḍal al-Dīn Kāshānī (12th cent.), Persian philosopher and poet, in Oxford Encyclopedia of Philosophy, Science, and Technology in Islam (Oxford, 2014), makes mention in the bibliography (entry Nafīsī) of an edition (1972, Kashan, Iran) of a Dīwān of Ḥakīm Afḍal al-Dīn Muḥammad Marāqī Kāshānī. My thanks to Peri Bearman for the reference.
13. Cf. Suter (note 11 above), no. 430. GAL 2:212, no. 2, gives the date listed by Ḥājji Khalīfa, 815H, which is wrong.
14. If this work is by Qāḍizāde, this appears to be the only attestation of it.
15. For this work see R. Pourjavady and S. Schmidtke, “Some Notes on a New Edition of a Medieval Philosophical Text in Turkey: Shams al-Dīn al-Shahrazūrī's al-Shajara al-ilāhiyya,” Die Welt des Islams 46 (2006): 77ff. One of the Istanbul manuscripts discussed here may well be this one.
16. Somebody somewhere added a comment to the title, which the cataloguer reproduced (here reproduced in bold): Sharḥ Talwīḥāt al-Suhrawardī fi al-manṭiq wa-al-ḥikma al-falsafiyya al-mā'ila ilā al-ḥaqq.
17. Without indication of the shāriḥ.
18. Same comment as in the preceding note.

- [99] Şehzade Mehmed 19: Mollā Khusraw Muḥammad b. Farāmurz, Ḥāshiya 'alā al-Talwīḥ. 1390–1400?, naskh, Arabic. DESCRIPTION: Probably produced in Bursa. Illuminated title in a naïve style on fol. 2b. Prepared for Bayezid I according to the record in the illuminated opening page on fol. 1a. Original dark chestnut-colored leather binding, a large medallion ornamented with knot motifs and large roses in the middle of the outer covers, a medallion ornamented with knot motifs in the middle of the dark red leather inner covers. The opening page indicates that the book was prepared for Bayezid I (r. 1389–1402), but considering Molla Khusraw's date of death (d. 1480) it seems unlikely that he could have written the book during the period of Bayezid I. Thus, the names of the sultans on the opening page could be wrong. On the other hand, the binding and illumination of the manuscript reflects the Ottoman style in ca. 1400. Thus, the manuscript is a rare copy with a dedication to Bayezid I. 182 folios, 19 lines. 252 × 170, 165 × 85 mm. SEAL: Bayezid II, fol. 1a, 18b.

APPENDIX III WITH PLATES FROM MANUSCRIPTS AT THE TOPKAPI PALACE MUSEUM LIBRARY

SOME BOOKS BEARING THE SEAL OF BAYEZID II AND/OR DEDICATIONS TO HIM:
A COMPARISON OF TITLES INSCRIBED BY HIS LIBRARIAN AND CORRESPONDING ENTRIES IN THE LIBRARY INVENTORY

TSMK, AHMED III COLLECTION

[1] *A. 59 (Karatay: A 2107): Missing from MS Török F. 59.

There is no title in the hand of ‘Atufi above the opening page, nor on the flyleaf of this manuscript, which interprets the first sura of the Qur’an (al-Fātiḥa). The abbreviated title on the renewed sticky label of the binding is Kitābu al-rawḍati al-fā’iḥati. The longer title in the frontispiece (fol. 1a), written in a monumental cursive script in gold, Kitābu al-rawḍati al-fā’iḥati fī tafsīri al-fātiḥati, matches verbatim the entry in ‘Atufi’s inventory (26 {7}). Because the intact volume lacks seal impressions of Bayezid II and a title assigned by ‘Atufi, it may be a later copy of the same work that is listed in the inventory. The frontispiece gives the author’s name as Husain b. Maya al-Maghribi al-Maliki. On fol. 30a–b is a lengthy dedication to Bayezid II, dated 911 (1505–6), where the author repeats his own name and identifies himself as the “keeper of the book treasury of the lofty noble [royal] residence” (khādiman bihi khizānata kutubi al-maqarri al-ashrafi al-‘ālī). This suggests that he was perhaps appointed as the successor of ‘Atufi, who had left the post of court librarian by 1504 (Ramadan 909), or he may have been one of the library scribes. Waqf seal of Ahmed III on fol. 1a.

[2] *A. 156 (Karatay: A 1676): Missing from MS Török F. 59.

The title on fol. 1b is Kitābu al-tibyāni fī tajwīdi al-Qur’āni. It is dated the beginning of Dhu’l Qa’dah 912 (March 1507). The same title appears on the renewed sticky label of the binding. Dedicated to Bayezid II on fol. 5a, with his seal on fols. 1a, 102b. Waqf seal of Ahmed III on fol. 1a.

[3] *A. 301/1 (Karatay: A 2833): Missing from MS Török F. 59.

The title above the flyleaf is Al-Juz’u al-awwalu [al-thānī, crossed out] min Kitābu jāmi’i al-uṣūli min al-aḥādīthi al-nabīyyati -‘alayhi al-ṣalawātu wa-al-salāmu. No sticky label on the binding. This first volume of a two-volume Arabic work on the principles of hadith by Ibn al-Athir (d. 1210) was copied by Ghiyath al-Din ‘Ali b. Ahmad on 10 Rabi’ II, 912 (August 30, 1506). Bayezid II’s seal is stamped only in this first volume of the set (fols. 6a, 418b); the second volume A. 301/2 (Karatay: A 2834) copied in the same year lacks his seal. The first volume also has Ahmed III’s almond-shaped seal bearing his accession date 1115 (1703) on fol. 2a, and his round waqf seal on fol. 6a.

[4] *A. 558 (Karatay: A 3176): Included in MS Török F. 59 [55 {10–11}, Kitābu zubdati al-jawāmi’i al-muḥammadiyyati wa-barqati al-lawāmi’i al-aḥmadiyyati fī al-jihādi bi-al-aḥādīthi]. PLATE 1 [1–3]

The same title appears above fol. 1a and on the authentic rectangular sticky label of the binding, except that it ends with fi al-ahādīthi. This work on hadith related to the subject of jihad is dedicated to Mehmed II in gold letters on fol. 13b. Bayezid II's seal on fols. 1a, 291b. Ahmed III's waqf seal on fol. 1a.

[5] *A. 607 (Karatay: A 3103): Missing from MS Török F. 59.

No title is assigned by 'Atufi on the flyleaf or opening page; the original binding lacks a sticky label. An Arabic commentary concerning hadith on the subject of belief by the former palace librarian Hayreddin Hızır b. Mahmud 'Atufi, titled Kitābu al-jawharati al-jināniyyati fi al-masā'ili al-imāniyyati fi sharhi al-hadithi al-muta'alliqi bi-al-imāni, dated end of Dhu'l Qa'dah 916 (February 1511) on fol. 50a. The author was a Friday preacher when he presented this work to the sultan as an offering to the imperial treasury (fi khidmāti khizānati uthmāniyyati khāqāniyyati Sultān Bāyezīd khāniyyati islāmiyyati). No seal of Bayezid II but dedicated to him on fols. 2a, 93b–94a. Ahmed III's waqf seal on fol. 1a.

[6] *A. 1017 (Karatay: A 3434): Missing from MS Török F. 59.

Two titles above fol. 1a: Sharhu ādābi al-fārisiyyati / Kitābu sharhi Kitāb ādābi al-fārisiyyati fi al-fiqhi. No sticky label remains on the original binding. An Arabic commentary on Abu Bakr Ahmad b. 'Umar al-Khashshaf's (d. 874) work on Hanafi jurisprudence by 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Aziz b. Maza (d. 1141). The flyleaf has an ex libris: min kutubi Sultān Bāyezīd. Copied by Abu 'Ali b. Khalil on 17 Ramadan 870 (May 3, 1466). Bayezid II's seals on fols. 1a, 235b. Ahmed III's almond-shaped seal bearing his accession date 1115 (1703) on fol. 2a.

[7] *A. 1116 (Karatay: A 6967): Included in MS Török F. 59 [198 {7}, Kitābu al-siyāsati al-mulūkiyyati]. PLATE 2 [1–2]

The same title appears above fol. 1a and on the slightly damaged authentic rectangular sticky label of the binding. An Arabic work on ethics and politics by Taj al-Din Abu Muhammad 'Abd Allah b. 'Umar b. Muhammad al-Sarakhsi al-Dimashqi (d. 1242). Dedicated to Bayezid II in the illuminated roundel of the opening page. Copied in 895 (1490) and stamped with Bayezid II's seal on fols. 1a, 87a. Ahmed III's waqf seal on fol. 1a.

[8] *A. 1490 (Karatay: F 96): Missing from MS Török F. 59.

The title on fol. 1a is Sharhu al-Asmā'i al-husnā' al-mawsūmu bi-Mir'āti al-salāṭini bi-al-fārisiyyati. No sticky label on the binding. A Persian commentary on the Beautiful Names of God, dedicated in 909 (1503–4) to Sultān Bāyezīd on fols. 2b–3a. An autograph manuscript in the hand of its author, Mawlana al-Sufi al-Samarqandi, who asks for alms to be sent annually to Mecca where he was "residing at the madrasa of the Mamluk Sultan" (sākīn fi madrasa Sultān al-Miṣr), probably the madrasa of Qa'itbay, dated 1479. Bayezid II's seal on fols. 1a, 116a. Ahmed III's waqf seal on fol. 1a.

[9] *A. 1498 (Karatay: A 5181): Missing from MS Török F. 59.

The opening pages where the title assigned by 'Atufi would have appeared are missing, as is the sticky label of the original binding. The title on the frontispiece (fol. 1a) is Tuhfatu al-asāṭini li-'ayni al-salāṭini. An Arabic work on Sufism written by Ibrahim b. Shaykh al-Islam Sharaf al-Din Musa al-Halabi, dedicated to Bayezid II in the beginning of Dhu'l Hijja 906 (June 1501) in Istanbul. It was "made by order of the sultan's treasury" (bi-rasm khizānati al-malik ... al-Sultān Bāyezīd). Bayezid II's seal on fol. 194a. The waqf seal of Ahmed III's on fol. 1a.

[10] *A. 1672 (Karatay: A 8150): Included in MS Török F. 59 [277 {6, 8}, Kitābu al-fawā'id al-ghiyāthiyyati fi al-ma'ānī, 2 copies]. PLATE 3 [1–2]

The same title appears above the flyleaf and on fol. 1a. No sticky label remains on the original binding. An Arabic treatise on rhetoric by 'Adud al-Din al-Iji (d. 1355) named after the Ilkhanid vizier Ghiyas al-Din. It is dedicated to Mehmed II in the illuminated almond-shaped medallion on fol. 1a, which begins by praising the author. Copied according to the colophon (fol. 37b) by Ahmad b. 'Ali al-Maragha'i on 14 Rabi' II, 873 (November 1, 1468). Bayezid II's seal on fols. 1a, 37b. Ahmed III's waqf seal on fol. 1b, and probably his erased round seal on fol. 1a.

This third copy of the work listed above [10] is bound together with a commentary on the same work. The title above the flyleaf repeats verbatim the inventory's entry, except for its end, fī mujallad. No title appears on the opening page (fol. 1a); the renewed sticky label on the original binding reads Kitābu al-fawā'id al-ghiyāthiyyati. The first treatise is dedicated on fol. 73a to Mehmed II at the end of Safar 867 (November 1462). The dedication medallion of the second treatise (fol. 26a) states it was made by order of Mehmed II's treasury (bi-rasm khizānati al-sultān). Its colophon on fol. 132a gives the date 28 Rabi' I, 867 (December 21, 1462). Both were copied by Muhammad b. al-Murad, known as Ibn Mevlana Hüsām. Bayezid II's seal on fols. 1a, 132b. Ahmed III's waqf seal on fol. 1a.

[11] *A. 1798 (Karatay: A 4910): Missing from MS Török F. 59.

The flyleaf title is Hāshiyatu 'Atūfī 'alā Sharḥi al-Sayyid al-Sharīf 'alā al-Mawāqifi al-Ījī. The same title on the damaged sticky label of the binding is partly legible. The former palace librarian Hayreddin Hızır b. Mahmud 'Atufi's gloss on al-Sayyid al-Sharīf al-Jurjani's commentary on al-Ījī's work on theology, dated Muharram 913 (June 1507) on fol. 57a. The words, Odadan çıkan 'arabī, written on the flyleaf indicate the transfer of this Arabic volume from the Privy Chamber to the Inner Treasury. Though dedicated to him, there is no seal of Bayezid II. Ahmed III's waqf seal on fol. 1a.

The flyleaf title is Kitābu talkhīṣi muḥaṣṣali li-mawlānā Naṣir al-Dīn al-Ṭūsī ṣāḥibi al-matni al-tajridi min 'ilmi al-kalāmi. A shorter version of the title appears on the renewed yet damaged sticky label of the binding, omitting "min 'ilmi al-kalāmi." Nasir al-Din al-Tusi's (d. 1274) abbreviation of Fakhr al-Din al-Razi's (d. 1209) Arabic treatise on theology and philosophy. No seal of Bayezid II, but made in order to be read by him (bi-rasm muṭāla'a al-sultān) according to the dedication on fol. 1a. Yet it was originally written for Mehmed II. The words Odadan çıkan 'arabī on the flyleaf record this Arabic volume's transfer from the Privy Chamber to the Inner Treasury. Ahmed III's waqf seal on fol. 1b.

[13] *A. 1896 (Karatay: A 4993): Included in MS Török F. 59 [311 {12–14}, Tarjumatu al-baqiyyati min Kitābi Yamistūs al-wathanī fī madhāhibi al-awwalīna min 'abadati al-aṣnāmi (on the margin: fī al-umūri al-'ajibati), 2 copies]. PLATE 4 [1–3]

The same title is repeated verbatim above fol. 1a, except for the marginal annotation. An abbreviated label written under it reads Kitābu al-baqiyyati. The flyleaf title is: Tarjumatu al-baqiyyati min Kitābi Yamistūs. The title on the binding's renewed sticky label reads Kitābu baqiyyati min Kitābi Yamistūs al-wathanī. An anthology comprising the translations from Greek into Arabic of the remains of George Gemistos Plethon's (d. ca. 1450–54) controversial neo-pagan work, Nomoi (Laws), his Compendium Zoroastreorum et Platoniorum dogmatum, and his edition of the Chaldean Oracles. Bayezid II's seals on fols. 1a, 108b. Ahmed III's waqf seal on fol. 1a. A second copy listed in the inventory with a variant title seems to be lost: Tarjamatu Kitābi Yamistūs al-wathanī tarjamatan thāniyatan fī madhāhibi 'abadati al-aṣnāmi (311 {14}).

[14] *A. 1932 (Karatay: A 7227): Uncertain whether included in MS Török F. 59 [156 {15–18}, Qānūnu fī al-ṭibbi, six copies listed].

No title is written in the opening page. The flyleaf and sticky label are missing. A copy of Ibn Sina's medical treatise datable to the second half of the fifteenth century. Bayezid II's seal on fols. 1a, 504a. Ahmed III's waqf seal on fol. 1a. On fol. 504a is the round seal of the physician "Maḥmūd al-Ṭabīb bin Meḥmed al-Ḥasīb."

[15] *A. 1960 (Karatay: F 253): Missing from MS Török F. 59.

A Persian almanac, whose title on fol. 1a is Şahā'if fi al-taqwīm. Dated 915 (1510) and written by Yusuf b. 'Umar al-Sa'ati, the timekeeper of Mehmed II's "New Mosque" in Istanbul. Ordered by the treasury (li-rasm khizānati) of Bayezid II and dedicated to him on fol. 1a, but it lacks Bayezid II's seal. Ahmed III's waqf seal on fol. 1a.

[16] *A. 1982 (Karatay: A 7313): Missing from MS Török F. 59.

No title above the opening page; the abbreviated title on the flyleaf is Rujū'i al-shaykhi fi al-ṭibbi. The title on the authentic rectangular sticky label of the binding reads: Kitābu rujū'i al-shaykhi ilā ṣibāhi fi al-ṭibbi. This is another copy of one of the works that was bound together with another book in a single volume according to 'Atufi's inventory (160 {14–15}): Kitābu jāwami'i al-ladhdhāti fi al-ṭibbi al-bāhī wa-Kitābu rujū'i al-shaykhi ilā ṣibāhi fi al-ṭibbi al-bāhī fi mujalladin wāhidin. The Arabic treatise on sexology by Shihab al-Din Abu al-'Abbas Ahmad b. Yusuf al-Tifashi (d. 1253) is classified under medical sciences. The words Odadan çıkan on the flyleaf indicate its transfer from the Privy Chamber to the Inner Treasury. Copied for Sultan Bayezid II, who is praised in a poem on fol. 229a, but it lacks his seal. Ahmed III's waqf seal on fol. 1a.

The title on the renewed sticky label of the binding is Kitābu tadhhibi al-tadhhibi, followed by the number of lines per page. A work on medicine by a contemporary physician, Muhammad b. Mansur al-'Arabi. Written for and dedicated to Sultan Bayezid II on fol. 2a, but it lacks his seal. Ahmed III's waqf seal on fol. 1a.

[18] *A. 2005 (Karatay: F 273): Included in MS Török F. 59 [167 {5–6}, Risālatun fi waja'i al-mafāṣili wa-ghayrihā fi al-ṭibbi]. PLATE 5 [1–2]

The perfectly matching title assigned by 'Atufi above fol. 1a is the modification of a previous title, to which he added Risālatun in the beginning and fi al-ṭibbi at the end. The latter phrase was crossed out by a subsequent librarian and under it was added bi-al-fārisiyyati with the word ṣahḥ next to it (meaning "correct"). The renewed sticky label of the original Italian red velvet binding cover uses the latter version: Fī waja'i al-mafāṣili wa-ghayrihā bi-al-fārisiyyati. A Persian medical treatise on the treatment of joint pains by the physician Mas'ud b. Hakim al-Din al-Tabib al-Hasani, dedicated to Sultan Mehmed II, who is known to have suffered from gout (fols. 1a–4a). The illuminated roundel on fol. 1a indicates that it was made "by order of the sultan's treasury" (bi-rasm khizānati al-sultān). The colophon on fol. 141a gives the date 14 Safar 881 (June 8, 1476). Bayezid II's seals on fols. 1a, 141b. Ahmed III's waqf seal on fol. 1a.

[19] *A. 2045 (Karatay: A 7369): Missing from MS Török F. 59.

The title on fol. 1a is Shajarati al-ṭibbi. No sticky label on the binding. An Arabic medical treatise written at the beginning of Jumada II 917 (August 1511) in Edirne in the hand of the author, Ahmad al-Hayati al-Tabib b. Muhammad al-Qurayshi, who was a head physician in Damascus (ra'īs al-ṭibbi bi-Dimashq). The dedication on fol. 1a states that it was made "by order of the sultan's imperial treasury" (li-rasm al-khizānati al-'āmirati al-sultāniyyati al-khāqāniyyati). Also dedicated to Bayezid II on fol. 1b, with his seal on fols. 1a, 43a. Ahmed III's waqf seal on fol. 1a.

[20] *A. 2051 (Karatay: A 7277): Missing from MS Török F. 59.

The title on fol. 1a is Sharḥu Kullīyyāti al-Qānūncha bi-al-‘arabīyyati fī al-ṭibbi. The abbreviated title on the renewed sticky label of the original binding is Kitābu sharḥi Kullīyyāti Qānūncha, which is followed by the number of lines per page. An Arabic commentary on the abbreviation of Ibn Sina’s medical treatise (Qānūn) by al-Chaghmini (Jaghmini, d. 1344), completed on 15 Jumada I, 915 (August 31, 1509) by a physician who identifies himself as al-mutaṭabbib ibn al-mutaṭabbib Rūḥ Allāh b. Akhī al-mutaṭabbib. He must be the son of the Ottoman physician Akhi Çelebi (d. 1524) who, in turn, was the son of the Tabrizi physician Kamal al-Din. A dedicatory poem praising Bayezid II is written on fols. 3b–4a. Bayezid II’s seal on fols. 1a, 242b. Ahmed III’s waqf seal on fol. 1a.

[21] *A. 2124 (Karatay: T 1769): Included in MS Török F. 59 [168 {1–3}], Kitābu qarābādīni bi-al-turkiyyati fī al-ṭibbi wa-Mukhtaṣaru Jālīnūs fī al-amrādi wa-al-adwiyati fī al-ṭibbi fī mujalladin wāḥidin.

The same title referring to two treatises is repeated verbatim on fol. 1a, except for the end mentioning their being bound in one volume, fī mujalladin wāḥidin. The binding’s sticky label is missing. A Turkish translation prepared in 858 (1454) through the mediation of the personal physician of Prince Bayezid in Amasya during his father Mehmed II’s reign. It was Tabib Sharaf al-Din b. ‘Ali b. al-Hajj İlyas al-‘Amasi (Şerefeddin Sabuncuoğlu) who translated into Turkish the Persian pharmacological handbook, or antidotarium, by Zayn al-Din Isma‘il b. Hasan al-Jurjani (d. 1137), titled Dhakhīrah-i Khwārazmshāhī (also known as Qarābādīn-i Khwārazmshāh). Two manuscript copies of the Persian version with Bayezid II’s seal exist: SK, Ayasofya 3620, ca. 1470; and TSMK, A. 1963 (Karatay F 271). The translator explains that he added to the original thirty-one chapters two extra chapters and a medical dictionary (fol. 2a). Copied by Mehmed b. ‘Ali b. Muzaffar in 881 (1476–77), with a dedication to Prince Bayezid b. Sultan Mehmed on fol. 2a. Bayezid II’s seal on fol. 1a, 187b. Ahmed III’s waqf seal on fol. 1a.

[22] *A. 2414 (Karatay: A 5237): Included in MS Török F. 59 [196 {15}], Sharḥu Qawsnāmah-i kamālī al-millati wa-al-dīni. PLATE 6 [1–2]

The same title appears on the slightly damaged authentic rectangular sticky label of the binding and above fol. 1a. A different title under it is erased: Qawsnāmah-i Kamāl Ismā‘il. This is a commentary on Kamal al-Din Isma‘il b. ‘Abbas Muhammad b. ‘Abd al-Razzaq al-Isfahani’s (d. 1180) al-Risālat al-Qawsiyya, by Abu ‘Abdallah Mahmud b. ‘Umar b. Mahmud al-Najati al-Nishaburi. Bayezid II’s seal on fols. 1a, 120b. Ahmed III’s waqf seal on fol. 1a.¹

[23] *A. 2460 (Karatay: A 6927): Included in MS Török F. 59 [198 {8}], Taqwīmu al-siyāsati al-mulūkiyyati. PLATE 7

The same title is repeated verbatim above fol. 1a, but no sticky label remains on the original binding. The longer description under the title assigned by ‘Atufi was seemingly written earlier in a magnificent gold thuluth script. It summarizes the contents of this book on ethics and politics compiled by Abu Nasr al-Farabi (d. 950), which contains the wise sayings of Plato and other philosophers. The volume was copied by the accomplished calligrapher Shams al-Din Ahmad al-Qudsi on 19 Muharram 886 (March 20, 1481). The crimson velvet outer covers of the binding, whose inner covers are decorated with vegetal scrolls, are unique features of Mehmed II’s books. However, probably caught between the reigns of two sultans while being bound, this volume is dedicated neither to Mehmed II, who passed away shortly thereafter on May 3, 1481, nor to his successor Bayezid II. The seals of Bayezid II are stamped on fols. 1a and 182b, with Ahmed III’s waqf seal on fol. 1a.²

[24] *A. 2493 (Karatay: A 6943): Missing from MS Török F. 59.

The title on fol. 1a is Kitābu ghurari al-khaṣā‘īsi al-wāḍiḥati wa-‘urari al-naqā‘īsi al-fāḍiḥati. No sticky label on the binding. The dedication to Bayezid II on fol. 1a indicates that it was made by order of his treasury (bi-rasm al-khizānati). An Arabic work on ethics and politics by Muhammad b. Ibrahim b. Yahya b. ‘Ali al-Ansari Jamal al-Din Watwat (d. 1318) copied, according to the chronogram on fol. 71b, by Muhammad b. al-Shaykh Ibrahim al-Halabi in 917 (1511). No seal of Bayezid II. Ahmed III’s waqf seal on fol. 1a.

[25] *A. 2698 (Karatay: A 8732): Included in MS Török F. 59 [296 {3–8}], Kitābu tuhfati al-hādīyati al-mutarjamu bi-al-turkiyyati wa-al-rūmiyyati wa-al-afranjiyyati wa-ghayrihā fi lughati al-fursi wa-Kitābu Īsāghūjī ‘alā al-lughati al-‘arabiyyati al-mutarjamu bi-al-yūnāniyyati fi al-mantiqi wa-Risālatu al-amthilati al-muṭṭari[da]ti al-mutarjamati bi-al-fārisiyyati wa-ghayrihā wa-Risālatun fi al-‘ulūmi al-ḥikmiyyati wa-Risālatun fi taṣḥīhi asāmī al-ḥukamā’i al-yūnāniyyati wa-Risālatun fi iṣṭilāḥātī ‘ulamā’i al-hay’ati ‘alā al-lughati al-yūnāniyyati fi mujalladin wāḥidin].

There is no title matching that of ‘Atufi on the opening page, nor on the flyleaf, and no sticky label exists on the renewed binding. Listed in the inventory under the section on lexicons, the abbreviated title of this compendium above fol. 1a is Tuhfat al-hādīya (Gift of the Rod), with which the volume begins. Written by Muhammad b. Hajji Ilyas (d. before 1460), this piece is a lexicon comprising the translation of Persian verbs into Turkish, Greek, Latin (“Frankish”), and other languages. It is followed by several multilingual lexicons and manuals: on Porphyry’s Isagoge (“Introduction” to Aristotle’s “Categories”) in Arabic translated into Greek; on regular examples of conjugation translated into Persian and other languages; on philosophical sciences; on the correction of the names of Greek philosophers; and on the terminology in Greek used by astronomy scholars. Bayezid II’s seal on fols. 1a, 91b. Ahmed III’s waqf seal on fol. 1b.

[26.1–5] Shihab al-Din al-Suhrawardī’s (d. 1191) Treatises on Philosophy and Their Commentaries, Copied for or during the Reign of Sultan Mehmed II

[26.1] *A. 3183 (Karatay: A 6694): Included in MS Török F. 59 [355 {12–14, 15–16}], Ḥikmatu al-ishrāqi li-l-Suhrawardī fi al-ḥikmatī al-falsafīyyati, 3 copies].

The same title appears above the flyleaf; no sticky label on the original binding. The right side of the double-page illuminated frontispiece states it was ordered to be read (bi-rasm muṭāla’a) by Sultan Mehmed II, while the left page identifies the author as al-Suhrawardī. Bayezid II’s seal on the flyleaf and fol. 247b. Ahmed III’s waqf seal on fol. 1b.

*A. 3267 (Karatay: A 6696): This second copy at the palace library has the word Matnu added to the beginning of the same title, above the opening page (fol. 1a). The abbreviated title on the renewed sticky label of the replaced binding is Kitāb ḥikmat al-ishrāq. According to the illuminated dedication on fol. 1a, it was prepared by order of Mehmed II’s treasury (bi-rasm khizānati). The colophon (fol. 158a) gives the name of the calligrapher Sayyid Muhammad al-Munshi al-Sultani, and the date 882 (1477–78). Bayezid II’s seal on fols. 1a, 158b. Ahmed III’s waqf seal on fol. 1a.

[26.2] *A. 3236 (Karatay: A 6701): Included in MS Török F. 59 [355 {8–9}, 356 {2–3}], Sharḥu Ḥikmatī al-ishrāqi li-l-Quṭb al-‘Allāma al-Shīrāzī fi al-ḥikmatī al-falsafīyyati, 2 copies].

The same title is repeated verbatim on fol. 1a. The renewed sticky label on the original binding, covered by crimson velvet and a patterned Bursa brocade doublure, is Sharḥu Ḥikmatī al-ishrāqi li-l-‘Allāma al-Shīrāzī (d. 1310). Under the title on the opening page is an elaborate eulogy of the commentator Qutb al-Din Shirazi. The colophon on fol. 672b gives the completion date as Shawwal 885 (December 1480). Bayezid II’s seal on fol. 1a, 672b. Ahmed III’s waqf seal on fol. 1a.

*A. 3280 (Karatay: A 6702): ‘Atufi’s inventory lists six additional copies with a variant title: Sharḥu Hikmatī al-ishrāqī li-l-‘Allāma al-Shīrāzī fī al-ḥikmatī al-falsafīyyati, 354 {2–7}, 363 {3–4}. One of them is this manuscript copied during Mehmed II’s reign, where the same title is repeated verbatim on fol. 1a. Under it the author of the commentary is eulogized in naskh script in red ink, followed by a black ink ex libris of Bayezid II: min kitāb Sulṭān Bāyezīd. The colophon states it was copied in the beginning of Dhu’l Hijja 867 (July 1463) by Mehmed b. Mehmed Beg el-İzniki, known as Katibi (fol. 313a). Bayezid II’s seal on fol. 1a, 313b.

[26.3] *A. 3217 (Karatay: A 6688): Included in MS Török F. 59 [357 {12–14}, Kitābu al-talwīḥātī wa-Kitābu lawāḥiqī al-talwīḥātī wa-Kitābu al-lamaḥātī wa-Rasā’ilu ukhrā kulluhā li-l-Suhrawardī fī al-ḥikmatī al-falsafīyyati (fī mujalladin wāḥidin)].

A compendium containing eight treatises on philosophy by al-Suhrawardi. The same title appears above fol. 1a, except for the end mentioning its binding in a single volume, fī mujalladin wāḥidin. Those missing words are in fact an interlinear addition in the inventory. The renewed sticky label on the binding is abbreviated as Kitābu al-talwīḥātī wa-al-lawāḥiqī al-talwīḥātī wa-al-lamaḥātī wa-Rasā’ilu ukhrā kulluhā li-l-Suhrawardī fī al-ḥikmatī. The colophon on fol. 169b gives the date 865 (1460–61). Bayezid II’s seal on fols. 1a, 243b. Ahmed III’s waqf seal on fol. 1a.

[26.4] *A. 3266 (Karatay: A 6690): Included in MS Török F. 59 [358 {4–6}, Kitābu al-talwīḥātī wa-Kitābu al-muqāwamātī wa-Kitābu al-lamaḥātī wa-Kitābu ḥikmatī al-ishrāqī kulluhā li-l-Suhrawardī al-maqtūlī fī al-ḥikmatī al-falsafīyyati fī mujalladin wāḥidin].

A compendium containing four treatises by al-Suhrawardi. The same title is repeated verbatim above fol. 1a, except for the end, which mentions its binding in a single volume, fī mujalladin wāḥidin. Three red ink lines under this title list the four abbreviated titles and ask God’s mercy for their author, the executed philosopher-shaykh (al-shaykh al-faylasuf Shihāb al-Dīn al-maqtūl). The abbreviated title on the renewed sticky label of the original leather binding, typical of Mehmed II’s books with its patterned green velvet outer covers, is Kitāb al-talwīḥāt. The colophon on fol. 145b is dated end of Jumada II, 882 (October 1477). Bayezid II’s seal on fols. 1a, 145b. Ahmed III’s waqf seal on fol. 2a.

[26.5] *A. 3377 (Karatay: A 6693) Included in MS Török F. 59 [353 {15–19}, Kitābu al-mashārī’i wa-al-muṭāraḥātī li-l-Suhrawardī fī al-manṭiqī wa-al-ḥikmatī al-falsafīyyati, 3 copies]. PLATE 8 [1–3]

The same title appears above fol. 1a. The abbreviated title on the renewed sticky label of the binding is Kitābu al-mashārī’i al-muṭāraḥātī, followed by the number of lines per page. (A similar abbreviated title in MS Török F. 59, 341 {14} reads: Kitābu al-mashārī’i wa-al-muṭāraḥātī.) This multi-text volume contains al-Suhrawardi’s treatise on philosophy titled al-Muṭāraḥāt, his Hikmat al-ishrāq, and Qutb al-Din Mas‘ud al-Shirazi’s commentary on the latter work. The illuminated roundel on the opening page eulogizes al-Suhrawardi. According to the elaborate colophon in cursive gold letters on fol. 352b, the manuscript copied by Hızır b. Şahin was prepared by order of Sultan Mehmed II’s imperial treasury (li-rasm al-khizānati al-sulṭāniyyati) in mid-Rabī’ I, 865 (December 1460). Bayezid II’s seal on fols. 1a, 352b. Ahmed III’s waqf seal on fol. 1a.

*SK, Turhan Valide 210: This is one of the two other copies listed in the inventory. Its title above the opening page (fol. 1a) repeats verbatim ‘Atufi’s entry. The dedication panels of the illuminated frontispiece on the opening page state that it was made to be read (li-rasm muṭāla’a) by Sultan Mehmed II, while the central roundel gives an abbreviated title (Kitābu al-mashārī’i al-muṭāraḥātī) and the author’s name. No sticky label remains on the original binding. The colophon gives the calligrapher’s name as Shams al-Din al-Qudsi, and the date 10 Safar 871 (September

[27] *A. 3291 (Karatay: A 7117): Included in MS Török F. 59 [328 {10}, Fathu al-fathıyyati fî sharhi al-Fathıyyati fî al-hay'ati].

The title above the opening page (fol. 1a) repeats verbatim the title in the inventory; no sticky label on the binding. An elaborate dedication to Bayezid II wishes the continuation of his sultanate and caliphate on fols. 2b–3a. Identified by Karatay as Fathu al-fathıyyati, a commentary on 'Ali al-Qushji's (d. 1474) astronomical treatise titled al-Risālatu al-fathıyyati fî 'ilm al-hay'ati dedicated to Mehmed II upon his defeat of the Aqqoyunlu ruler Uzun Hasan in 878 (1473). Karatay misattributes this commentary to Muslihuddin Lari (d. 1571), but this is too late to be dedicated to Bayezid II. Therefore, the manuscript listed in 'Atufi's inventory must be an earlier commentary. Indeed, it was copied by Turali b. Rahman on Friday, 14 Shaban 890 (August 26, 1485) according to the colophon on fol. 200a. I believe it must be the commentary titled Fathu al-fathıyyati, which was dedicated to Bayezid II by Ghulam (Gulam or Köle) Sinan (d. 1506), a student of 'Ali al-Qushji's in Istanbul. This identification is based on my comparison of the identical dedicatory pages of the Topkapı manuscript with that of Gulam Sinan's manuscript bound in a compendium (SK, Fatih 5396), which is also dated 890 (1485) but has no seal impression of Bayezid II. The Topkapı manuscript has Bayezid II's seal on fols. 1a and 200b, with Ahmed III's waqf seal on fol. 1a.³

Another manuscript of the same work, attributable to Ghulam Sinan, is at the palace library (A. 3290; Karatay: A 7116), but it has no title assigned by 'Atufi above its opening page (fol. 1a) and lacks Bayezid II's seal. Nevertheless, it includes the same dedication to him (fol. 2a). The title on its flyleaf is Sharhu al-fathıyyati, and the renewed sticky label of its binding reads Kitābu Sharhu al-fathıyyati.

[28] *A. 3317 (Karatay: A 7081): Included in MS Török F. 59 [326 {12}, Kitābu al-tadhkirati fî 'ilmi al-hay'ati]. PLATE 9 [1–3]

The same title appears above fol. 1a and on the binding's partly torn authentic rectangular sticky label. The title on a second sticky label, added by a later librarian without removing the damaged original, no longer corresponds to that of 'Atufi's inventory: it reads Kitābu al-tadhkirati and specifies the number of lines per page. The title in a gold naskh script on the opening page is followed by a eulogy of Nasir al-Din al-Tusi (d. 1274), the author of this Arabic treatise on astronomy. Two lines in black ink under it comprise a glowing dedication to Sultan Mehmed II, wishing for the perpetuation of the star of his caliphate. Bayezid II's seal is on fols. 1a, 60a, with his ex libris on the flyleaf: Şāhibahu al-Sultān Bāyezīd bin Meḥemmed Khān khallada mulkahu. Ahmed III's waqf seal on fol. 1a.

[29] *A. 3328 (Karatay: A 7095): Included in MS Török F. 59 [330 {9–10, 13–14}, Kitābu taḥrīr-i Majisī li-l-Naṣīr al-Ṭūṣī fî al-hay'ati, 2 copies]. PLATE 10

The same title appears above fol. 1a, where an earlier title has been modified by the addition of li-l-Naṣīr al-Ṭūṣī fî al-hay'ati in a different hand. Under the title is Bayezid II's ex libris: min kutubi al-Sultān Bāyezīd bin Meḥemmed Khān khallada mulkahu. No sticky label remains on the binding. This Arabic commentary by Nasir al-Din al-Tusi (d. 1274) on Ptolemy's astronomy treatise, the Almagest, has Bayezid II's seal on fols. 1a, 127b. Ahmed III's waqf seal on fol. 1a.

*A. 3332 (Karatay: A 7096) is another copy of this manuscript at the palace library that was transcribed in 692 (1293). Stamped with Bayezid II's seal and the waqf seal of Ahmed III, fol. 1a features two previous ownership annotations dated 841 (1437–38) and 785 (1383–84). The abbreviated title assigned by 'Atufi above this opening page reads: Kitābu taḥrīr-i Majisī fî al-hay'ati. That title comes closer to a variant entry in the inventory (331 {1}): Taḥrīr-i Majisī fî ‘ilmi al-hay’ati. Therefore, this manuscript does not seem to be the second copy of the one listed above [29]. A later librarian has added the word sharḥ (commentary) after the first word of the title. The binding’s renewed sticky label in majuscule thuluth script includes this added word, but omits the discipline assigned by ‘Atufi: Kitābu sharḥi taḥrīri Majisṭi, followed by lines per page.

[30] *A. 3355 (Karatay: A 6652): Included in MS Török F. 59 [363 {10–12}, Kitābu al-ishārāti li-Ibn Sīnā’ wa-risālatun fī al-ḥikmiyyāti wa-Kitābu al-jumānati al-ilāhiyyati bi-al-‘arabiyyati al-manẓūmati fī al-ḥikmiyyāti al-falsafiyyati fī mujalladin wāḥidin]. PLATE 11 [1–2]

The same title, except for fī mujalladin wāḥidin, appears above fol. 1a. No flap or sticky label on the binding. A volume containing Ibn Sina’s Arabic treatise on philosophy titled al-Ishārāt wa-al-tanbihāt. A note on the flyleaf provides an abbreviated title and identifies the owner of the book: Kitābu al-ishārāti wa-al-jumānati al-ilāhiyyati ṣāhibahū al-Sultān Bāyezīd bin Meḥammed Khān khallada mulka-hu. Bayezid II’s seal on fols. 1a, 212b. Ahmed III’s waqf seal on fol. 1a.

[31] *A. 3381 (Karatay: A 6860): Probably the same as Sharḥu al-Maṭālī’i li-l-Quṭb al-Rāzī fī al-manṭiqi [MS Török F. 59, 341 {7}; 342 {6–7}, 2 copies].

The title above the flyleaf is Kitābu sharḥi Maṭālī’i li-Quṭb. Under it is the ex libris: Ṣāhibahu Sultān Bāyezīd. The crossed-out, partly legible title above fol. 1a presumably assigned by ‘Atufi reads ... Sharḥu al-Maṭālī’i fī al-manṭiqi. The renewed sticky label of the binding is also only partly legible: Sharḥu al-Maṭālī’, followed by the number of lines per page. This work has been identified as the Lawāmi’u al-asrāri sharḥi Maṭālī’i al-anwāri, an Arabic commentary on Siraj al-Din Mahmud b. Abi Bakr al-Urmawī’s (d. 1283) book on logic by Qutb al-Din Muhammad b. Muhammad al-Tahtani (d. 1364). Bayezid II’s seal on fols. 1a, 120b. Ahmed III’s waqf seal on fol. 2a.

[32] *A. 3428 (Karatay: A 6812): Included in MS Török F. 59 [342 {15–17}, Asāsu al-iqtibāsi bi-al-fārisiyyati li-l-Naṣīr al-Ṭūsī fī al-manṭiqi, 3 copies]. PLATE 12 [1–4]

The partly crossed-out flyleaf title is the same as that of the inventory: Asāsu al-iqtibāsi [crossed out later: bi-al-fārisiyyati] li-l-Naṣīr al-Ṭūsī fī al-manṭiqi. The short title on the renewed sticky label of the binding is Kitābu asāsi al-iqtibāsi, followed by the number of lines per page. An abbreviated title on fol. 1a differs from that of the inventory: Asāsu al-iqtibāsi li-l-Naṣīr al-Dīn al-Ṭūsī. A longer description written under it with the author’s name and the erroneous date 897 (1491–92) is crossed out. A translation of al-Tusi’s Persian work on logic into Arabic, dedicated to Sultan Mehmed II on fol. 2a. The completion date given on fol. 164b is the end of Safar 869 (October 1464). Bayezid II’s seal on fols. 1a, 168b. Ahmed III’s waqf seal on fol. 1a.

*A. 3441 (Karatay: A 6813): This is the second copy in the palace collection, also made for Mehmed II. The opening page gives the same title as the inventory: Asāsu al-iqtibāsi [crossed out later: bi-al-fārisiyyati] li-l-Naṣīr al-Ṭūsī fī al-manṭiqi. There is no sticky label on the binding. The colophon on fol. 179a gives the date Sunday, 21 Muharram 869 (September 23, 1464). Bayezid II’s seal on fols. 1a, 179b. Ahmed III’s waqf seal on fol. 1a.

*SK, Ayasofya 2480: This is the third copy of the same work, dated Dhu’l Hijja 869 (July–August 1465). The title on the flyleaf, which perfectly matches that of the inventory, reads: Kitābu asāsi al-iqtibāsi bi-al-fārisiyyati fī al-manṭiqi. The dedication panels of the illuminated frontispiece on fol. 1a state it was made to be read (bi-rasm muṭāla’a) by Sultan Mehmed II, while the central roundel gives the abbreviated title Kitābu asāsi al-iqtibāsi and the author’s name. Bayezid II’s seal on fols. 1a, 266b. Mahmud I’s waqf seal and that of his endowment inspector on fol. 1a.⁴

[33] *A. 3432 (Karatay: A 6891): Included in MS Török F. 59 [342 {18–19}, Kitābu al-mubīni fī sharḥi al-matīni fī al-mantiqi].

The same title appears above fol. 1a. No sticky label on the binding. A translation from Persian into Arabic, accompanied by a commentary, of the book on logic by Abu al-Mafahir al-Qadi al-Sawi. On fol. 2b it is dedicated to Mehmed II, who ordered the translation. The author praises the sultan's appreciation of books, philosophy, and the "ancient sciences." Bayezid II's seal on fols. 1a, 263b. Ahmed III's waqf seal on fol. 1a.

The same title appears above fol. 1a. Under it is written a variant title in a different hand, Sharḥu Maṭāli'i gharībi al-musammāi bi-Lawāmi'u al-afkārī. The abbreviated title on the renewed sticky label of the binding comes close to that of the inventory: Lawāmi'u al-afkārī fī sharḥi Maṭāli'i al-anwārī, followed by the number of lines per page. An Arabic commentary on Mahmud b. Abu Bakr al-'Urmawī's (d. 1198) work on logic copied by Yusuf b. Husayn al-Sivasi. The colophon on fol. 463b explains it was made to be read (li-muṭāla'a) by Sultan Mehmed II. Stamped with Bayezid II's seal on fols. 1b, 463b. Ahmed III's waqf seal on fol. 1a.

[35] *A. 3474 (Karatay: A 7143): Included in MS Török F. 59 [310 {12–13}, Kitābun fī al-ḥiyālī wa-al-umūri al-'ajībatī fī 'amali ālāti al-mā'i]. PLATE 14 [1–2]

The same title appears above fol. 1a of this anonymous manuscript with missing beginning and ending pages, which has been attributed to the Banu Musa brothers of ninth-century Baghdad. This manuscript copy, which probably dates to the fourteenth century, has an abbreviated title on the renewed sticky label of its damaged binding: Kitābun al-ḥiyālī 'amali ālāti al-mā'i. The Arabic treatise on hydraulic automata (pneumatics) is illustrated with mechanical devices featuring figural images of animals and even a naked man wearing a toga, whose faces have been deliberately effaced. Bayezid II's seal on fols. 1a, 85b. Ahmed III's waqf seal on fol. 1a.

[36] *A. 3479 (Karatay: A 7019): Included in MS Török F. 59 [334 {10}, Kitābu miftāḥi al-ḥisābi fī 'ilmi al-ḥisābi].

The same title appears above fol. 1a, except for the end, which classifies the work "in the science of arithmetic" (fī 'ilmi al-ḥisābi). The ex libris under the title misidentifies the subject as geometry: Ṣāḥibahu al-Sultān Bāyezīd bin Meḥmed Khān -khāllada mulkahu- kitāb fī al-handasa. The binding flap and sticky label are lost. A copy of the Timurid mathematician Jamshid al-Kashī's treatise on arithmetic in Arabic, dated 12 Jumada II, 833 (March 8, 1430) on fol. 173a. The work is dedicated to the Timurid ruler Ulugh Beg on fol. 3a. Bayezid II's seal on fols. 1a, 220b. Ahmed III's waqf seal on fol. 1a.

[37] *A. 3487 (Karatay: A 7124): Included in MS Török F. 59 [323 {17}, Risālatun fī al-ālāti al-nujūmiyyati al-ghayri al-mashhūrati]. PLATE 15 [1–2]

The same title appears above fol. 1a. The renewed sticky label of the binding adds the word Kitābu to the title's beginning. An Arabic work on astronomical instruments, dedicated to Sultan Bayezid II on fol. 4a by an unnamed astronomer. Bayezid II's seal on fols. 1a, 136b. Ahmed III's waqf seal on fol. 1a.

[38] *A. 3495 (Karatay: A 7123): Missing from MS Török F. 59.

The title above fol. 1a is Kitābu fī ma'rifati ḥaqīqiyyati mawḍu'āti al-kawākibi al-thābita wa-al-sayyārati li-khawāja İliyā al-yahūdī bi-al-nujūmi. The same title is repeated verbatim on the authentic rectangular sticky label of the binding's flap. The flyleaf identifies the author as Iliya, the Jew (Khawāja İliyā al-yahūdī). It was translated from Hebrew to Arabic in Istanbul in 908 (1502–3) by 'Abd al-Salam, a convert to Islam: Kitābu fī ma'rifati ḥaqīqiyya al-mawḍu'āti li-'Abd al-Salām al-muhtadī. A work on astrology dedicated to Sultan Bayezid II on fol. 1b. On fol. 88a the translator identifies himself as the convert ‘Abd al-Salām al-muhtadī and says he made the translation at the sultan’s suggestion (bi-talqīn al-Sultān). It has been established that the author Iliya (Ilyas ibn Ibrahim al-Yahudi) was known as ‘Abd al-Salam al-Muhtadi after his conversion to Islam. No seal of Bayezid II; Ahmed III’s waqf seal on fol. 1a.

[39] *A. 3563 (Karatay: F 618): Included in MS Török F. 59 [249 {16–17}, 250 {1}, 251 {7}, Kitāb-i ishqnāmah al-mashhūru bi-Mihr u Mushtarī, 3 copies]. PLATE 16 [1–3]

The front matter is missing; therefore, the title assigned by ‘Atufi is lost. The rhyming Persian couplet inside two cartouches embossed on the original leather binding ends with the title Mihr u Mushtarī. On fol. 1a, an illuminated roundel with a dedication to Bayezid II specifies that it was made by order of the sultan’s treasury (bi-rasm khizānati al-sultān). This illustrated manuscript is a literary work in Persian by Muhammed Assar (d. 1382), of which several copies are mentioned in ‘Atufi’s inventory without referring to its illustrations. Copied on Sunday 28 Ramadan 887 (November 10, 1482) by the illuminator Na‘im al-Din al-Katib b. Sadr al-Din al-mudhahhib. Bayezid II’s seal on fols. 1a, 191b. A round seal on fol. 1a has been erased.

*SK, Fatih 4130: Another illustrated copy of this work produced in the Aqqoyunlu workshop in Dhu’l Hijja of 894 (October–November 1498). Because it lacks opening pages, Bayezid II’s seal is stamped only on fol. 221a.⁵

[40] *B. 411: (Karatay: uncatalogued): Included in MS Török F. 59 [257 {9}, Safīnatun fihā khuṭūṭun naḥṣatun wa-Rasā’ilu fī mujalladin a‘ẓama]. PLATE 17 [1–2]

The same title appears verbatim in the sixth line above fol. 1a. A diagonal phrase in Turkish along the left side of the page, which reads “let it be recorded under divans” (devāvīnde derc oluna), is attributable to ‘Atufi. The monumental Timurid calligraphy album compiled during Shahrukh’s (d. 1447) reign contains primarily Arabic texts spanning the years 1267 to 1434, with only few texts in Persian. But Atufi’s inventory lists it under Persian divans presumably because of its Timurid provenance. A slanted line in the lower right corner gives the number of folios: ‘aded-i evrāk 169. In lines 2 to 5 another librarian has added a description of the contents of this “largish album” (kebīrce muraḥḩa) giving the number of folios as 170. Lines 7 to 9 added by yet another librarian in Turkish also mention the 170 folios of this “large album” (sefine-i kebīr). The words, Odadan çıkan ‘arabī, written in the first line, record this Arabic volume’s transfer from the Privy Chamber to the Inner Treasury. No sticky label remains on the binding. Bayezid II’s seal on fol. 1a and the last page; fol. 1a also bears Selim I’s round Inner Treasury seal and the oval sovereignty seal of Mustafa III.

TSMK, REVAN COLLECTION

[41] *R. 354 (Karatay: A 2838): Included in MS Török F. 59 [34 {9–10}, the second volume of a two-volume set, Mukhtaṣaru Jāmi‘i al-uṣūli fī al-ḥadīthi fī mujalladayni]. PLATE 18 [1–3]

The same title appears above the flyleaf and on the partly damaged authentic rectangular sticky label of the binding, except for the reference at the end mentioning “two volumes” (fī mujalladayni). Instead, the words “second volume” were added at the beginning: al-Mujalladu al-thānī min Mukhtaṣaru Jāmi’i al-uṣūli fī al-ḥadīthi. Under the title assigned by ‘Atufi, a variant (probably earlier) title is written in a monumental cursive script. Copied in 724 (1324) by Zayd b. Muhammad b. ‘Abd al-Majid b. Zayd al-Ba‘albaki al-Shafi’i. Bayezid II’s seal on fols. 1a, 251a. Ahmed III’s almond-shaped seal dated 1115 (1703) on fol. 2a, and the waqf seal of Mustafa III on fol. 1a.⁶

[42] *R. 880 (Karatay: F 475): Included in MS Török F. 59 [234 {10}, {14}, Kitābu makhzani al-asrāri li-l-Nizāmī, two copies]. PLATE 19

The same title appears above fol. 1a. A long variant title, which is probably earlier, written in red ink below eulogizes the author, “Shaykh Nizami.” No sticky label on the binding. A later librarian added a note beneath the central round seal, specifying the number of lines per page. Nizami’s (d. 1209) literary work in Persian, copied by Riyazi in the year 885 (1480–81). Bayezid II’s seal on fols. 1a, 77b. The waqf seal of Osman III on fol. 1a.

The same title appears above fol. 1a and on the authentic rectangular sticky label of the binding. A later librarian added on the same page, under the round waqf seal of Mahmud I, a variant title specifying the number of lines per page. The words Odadan çıkan türki above the flyleaf indicate the transfer of this Turkish volume from the Privy Chamber to the Inner Treasury. Written by Safa’i of Sinop, this versified chronicle recounts Bayezid II’s conquest of İnebahtı (Lepanto, 905/1499) and Modon (Methoni, 906/1500). Stamped with Bayezid II’s seal on fols. 1a, 131b.

[44] *R. 1465 (Karatay: T 1011): Included in MS Török F. 59 [185 {5}, Tarjamatu Kitābi al-mu’jami bi-al-turkiyyati li-Tāj-zādah -raḥimahu Allāhu ta’ālā fī al-tawārikhī]. PLATE 21 [1–4]

The same title appears above fol. 1a and on the partly damaged authentic rectangular sticky label of the binding. According to the illuminated dedication roundel on fol. 1a, the manuscript was produced by Bayezid II’s imperial order (bi-emr-i hümāyūn). The shorter title above the flyleaf (also numbered fol. 1), omits the name of Tacizade and the pious phrase showing that he had died: Tarjuma-i Tārikh-i mu’jam bi-al-turkiyya. The variant title written under it in a monumental cursive script mentions Tacizade, but again without referring to his death: Mukhtaṣar Tārikh-i Waṣṣāf-i Turkī, tarjuma-i Tāj-zāda. These alternate flyleaf titles apparently predate the two-line title on fol. 1a, because an erased earlier title detectable under the latter, at the end of the first line, features the name Waṣṣāf. This correction explains why Karatay’s catalogue identified the work as an abridged translation of Fadl Allah al-Qazwini’s (d. 1329) history of ancient Persian kings into Turkish, rather than a book by Wassaf. Qazwini’s history in Persian is known to have been translated into Turkish by Sarıca Kemal (Kemal-i Zerd, d. after 1489). The attribution to Tacizade in this volume may be erroneous unless he too translated the same Persian text, a point that requires further research. Bayezid II’s seal on fols. 1a, 132a. Mahmud I’s waqf seal on fol. 1a.

[45] *R. 1706 (Karatay: uncatalogued): Included in MS Török F. 59 [313 {14}, Kitābu miftāḥi al-nujūmi bi-al-fārisiyyati].

The same title appears above fol. 1a and on the partly torn, authentic rectangular sticky label of the binding. A Persian treatise on astrology/astronomy, dedicated to Sultan Bayezid II on fol. 2b, and written by Hamza b. ‘Abd al-Karim. Under four letters that have been interpreted by a twentieth-century reader as the completion date in abjad letters (on fol. 178b), the modern number 910 (1504–5), or alternatively the Arabic number 915 (1509–10), has been penciled in. But if this is indeed an abjad date (ṣ/ẓ/n/h), it would correspond to 945 (1530–31). Written sketchily in a different hand, the abjad date must be erroneous, as it is inconsistent with Bayezid II's seals on fols. 1a, 178b and the dedication to him. The sovereignty seal of Abdülhamid I on fol. 1a.

The same title appears verbatim above fol. 1a, where it is modified by addition and deletion, as well as on the partly damaged authentic rectangular sticky label of the binding. The abbreviated title assigned by a later librarian on fol. 2a reads: Maqāsid-i alḥān bi-ḥaṭṭ-i ta’līq, followed by the number of lines per page. This Persian treatise on music theory by ‘Abd al-Qadir b. Ghaybi al-Hafiz al-Maraghi was copied in 1435, a year before his death. It bears a dedication to Sultan Murad II, who had donated a village of Edirne as a fief in 1421 to the author's youngest son, ‘Abd al-‘Aziz, an affiliate of the sultan's court. The manuscript, stylistically affiliated with Timurid Herat, is believed to have been sent to Murad II by ‘Abd al-Qadir al-Maraghi, who had dispatched an earlier version of the same work, also dedicated to Murad II, in 1423 after entrusting his son to this sultan's court. According to the illuminated, almond-shaped dedication medallion of the double-page frontispiece on fol. 2a, the manuscript was made by order of the sultan's treasury (bi-rasm khizānati al-sultān). The name of the copyist, Muhammad b. Muhammad b. Ilyas, who completed the manuscript on 14 Jumada II, 838 (January 15, 1435), is given on fol. 71a. Bayezid II's seal on fols. 2a, 78b. The waqf seal of Osman III on fol. 2b. The second copy listed in ‘Atufi's inventory may have been the earlier copy of the same work sent to Murad II in 1423 or another version.⁷

[47] *H. 884 (Karatay: F 677): Included in MS Török F. 59 [246 {19}, Dīwān-i Qabūli]. PLATE 23 [1–3]

The same title appears above fol. 1a and on the partly damaged authentic rectangular sticky label of the binding. A poem and a couplet in Persian are written on fol. 1a and the facing back side of the flyleaf, respectively. The words Odadan çıkan fārisi inscribed above the front side of the flyleaf records the transfer of this Persian volume from the Privy Chamber to the Inner Treasury. A divan that includes poems on Mehmed II's conquest of Wallachia (Boğdan, 1476) and that is dedicated to him on fol. 6a. A small round seal on fol. 1a has been erased. Bayezid II's seals on fols. 1a, 107b.

[48] *H. 1123 (Karatay: uncatalogued): Included in MS Török F. 59 [249 {19}], Naẓmu Qiṣṣah-i Sultān Bāyezīd Khān -khallada Allāhu ta’ālā khilāfatahu]; see figs. 12a–d in Necipoğlu's essay in this volume. The same title appears verbatim in the authentic rectangular sticky label of the binding. A close variant is written above fol. 1a, which omits the pious phrase at the end: Kitābu naẓmi Qiṣṣah-i Sultān Bāyezīd. The original title assigned by the author, whose penname was formerly thought to be Ummī, is inscribed in the illuminated heading of fol. 1b: Shāhnāmāh az guftār-i Malik-i Āhī (A “Shāhnāmāh” Recounted by Malik-i Ahi). The almond-shaped seal of Ahmed III, dated 1115 (1703), is impressed on fol. 3a, whose first line clearly spells the author's penname as Āhī. This illustrated versified history in Persian covers the early years of Bayezid II's reign from 1481 up to 1485. The colophon refers to the author's given name as Malik-i Maḥmūd, and is signed by the scribe-cum-painter Darwish Mahmud bin ‘Abdullah Naqqash (fols. 98a–b). Dedicated to Bayezid II on fol. 13b and stamped with his seal on fols. 1a, 98b.

[49] *H. 1417 (Karatay: F 155): Included in MS Török F. 59 [251 {5–6}, Naẓm-i tawārīkh-i Sultān Meḥammed Khān bin Murād Khān -khullidat khilāfatuhum [sic]- wa-ghayruhū bi-al-fārisīyyatī].

A nearly identical title appears in the second of two lines, written on fol. 2a above one of the paired frontispiece medallions, where the grammatically erroneous phrase in the inventory after the sultan's name is omitted. The first line gives the title, Tārīkh-i Āl-i 'Osmān. The second line, matching 'Atufi's entry, reads: Naẓm-i tawārīkh-i Sulṭān Meḥmed Khān bin Murād Khān wa-ghayruhū bi-al-fārisīyyati. A versified history in Persian dedicated in Dhu'l Hijja 878 (April–May 1474) to Sultan Mehmed II by the author Mir Sayyid 'Ali b. Muzaffar-i Ma'ali (or Mu'ali). The paired medallions of the frontispiece (fols. 1b–2a) provide the original title, Khunkar-nāmah, and explain that the manuscript was prepared by order of Mehmed II's treasury (bi-rasm khizānati sulṭān). Bayezid II's seal on fols. 1a, 183b.

TSMK, YENİ YAZMALAR COLLECTION

[50] *Y.Y. 830 (Karatay: F 246): Included in MS Török F. 59 [319 {6–7} and 321 {9–11}], Kitābu ṭālī'i wilādati Sulṭān Meḥmed bin Sulṭān Murād -ṭāba tharāhumā wa-ja'ala al-jannata mathwāhumā- min qibali al-nujūmi, 2 copies]. PLATE 24 [1–3]

The same title appears in lines 2 to 4 above fol. 1a. A variant title in a monumental cursive script in line 1, probably written earlier by a different person, reads: Tālī'-i mawlūd-i khudāwandigār. No sticky label on the binding. A horoscope of Sultan Mehmed II in Persian, based on the rising sign (ascendant) at the time of his birth, prepared by the Iranian binder-cum-calligrapher Ghiyath al-Din Mujallid al-Isfahani in Istanbul in 886 (1481) according to the colophon on fol. 264a. Dedicated to Mehmed II on fols. 5a–6a. Bayezid II's seal on fols. 1a, 264b. The waqf seal of Mahmud I and a small round seal on fol. 1a.⁸

NOTES

1. Another copy of this work is listed in MS Török F. 59 (196 {17}) with a variant title: Sharḥu Risālati al-kamālī al-qawsīyyati.
2. A variant title in MS Török F. 59 (197 {11}) must refer to a different copy: Kitābu taqwīmi al-siyāsati al-mulūkiyyati fī umūri al-salṭanaṭi.
3. I am pleased to report that my attribution to Ghulam Sinan was independently made in the essay by Jamil Ragep et al., which was submitted to the present volume after the completion of my essay and appendix; they cite Ekmeleddin İhsanoğlu et al., Osmanlı Astronomi Literatürü Tarihi, 2 vols. (Istanbul, 1997), 1:68 (no. 35).
4. 'Atufi's inventory lists a variant title 342 {14} with Kitābu added to the beginning, and several other versions without the author's name.
5. The inventory also cites a fourth copy with an abbreviated title, Kitāb-i Mihr u Mushtarī, 251 {14}.
6. The inventory also lists a single-volume version titled Mukhtaṣaru Jāmi'i al-uṣūli fī al-ḥadīthi fī mujalladin wāhidin (34 {8–9}).
7. For extant manuscripts of this work, see Recep Uslu, Merâgî'den Sultan II. Murad'a Müziğin Maksatları: Makāsidi'l-Elhân (Ankara, 2015), 20–23. Other works on music by al-Maraghi are also listed in the library inventory. One of these is his commentary in Persian on the Arabic treatise of 'Abd al-Mu'min b. Yūsuf b. Fākhir al-Urmawī (d. 1294). The inventory lists two copies of that commentary: Sharḥu Kitābi al-adwāri bi-al-fārisīyyati li-'Abd al-Qādir fī al-mūsīqī (335 {19}, 336 {1}); the other copy of the same work is listed within a compendium as Sharḥu Kitābi al-adwāri bi-al-fārisīyyati li-'Abd al-Qādir al-Marāghī fī al-mūsīqī wa-Kitābu fawā'id-i 'ashrat li-'Abd al-Qādir al-Marāghī fī al-mūsīqī fī mujalladin wāhidin (336 {1–3}). One of the copies can be identified as TSMK, A. 3470 (Karatay, F 280). Its title on top of fol. 1a reads: Sharḥu Kitābi al-adwāri bi-al-fārisīyyati li-'Abd al-Qādir al-Marāghī fī al-mūsīqī. Bayezid II's seal is stamped on fols. 1a, 42b.
8. The unidentified small round seal has been read by Garo Kürkman as "al-Sayyid Aḥmad Muḥsin [1] 204?"

TRANSLATION OF 'ATUFI'S OTTOMAN TURKISH PREFACE TO THE PALACE LIBRARY INVENTORY

THE RULE OF THE REGISTER AND ITS EXCEPTIONS

One rule is: that for each of the books, whether it belongs to one or more disciplines, its repository must be one; in the register each of these [books] is included under [only] one section. An exception: But sometimes in a book there are two aspects; with regard to one aspect it is included under one discipline, and regarding the other aspect it is included under another discipline, such as Bidāyat al-hidāya (Primer for the Guidance), which deals both with questions on Sufism and problems related to the science of jurisprudence. Therefore, in a book like this sometimes one aspect is considered and it is included under one discipline; but sometimes, because it is intended for both disciplines, and given the probability that it might be requested [by a potential reader] from each of those disciplines, some of its copies are included under one discipline and others are included under the other discipline. For example, Bidāyat al-hidāya, which is associated with His Highness Imam Ghazali: some of its copies have been included under the science of Sufism and some of its copies have been included under the science of jurisprudence.

Another rule is this: that if there are multiple books in a volume, it is with regard to the book which is more esteemed and whose probability of being requested is higher, or else is rare, that the bound volume is included with books under the aforesaid book's discipline. An exception: But sometimes it happens that among the multiple books in the volume there are equally esteemed works in terms of demand and rarity as the aforesaid book. When it is like this, then, making a selection is preferable. However, if by chance there is another volume containing the very same multiple books, it is allowable that this volume be included with books under the discipline of the other book rather than the discipline of the aforesaid book, provided that the other book is equally esteemed and might be the reason for requesting the volume. In other words, some copies should be included under the former [discipline], and other copies under the latter.

Yet another rule is this: that each title of a book that exists in the register according to a particular manner is exactly the same as the particular manner in which it exists on the binding flap and also on the front page. For example, if the phrase Kitāb al-iḥyā' (Book of the Revival) is written on a book, it is written exactly the same way also in the register. If Kitāb iḥyā' 'ulūm al-dīn (Book of Revival of the Religious Sciences [by al-Ghazali]) occurs in the book, it is written exactly the same way in the register as well. If Iḥyā' al-'ulūm (Revival of the Sciences) occurs in the book, without the word Kitāb, it is written in the register too in exactly the same way. If in the book Iḥyā' occurs without the word Kitāb and without the word 'ulūm, it is written in the register too in exactly the same way, except in rare cases or by mistake. An exception: But if the book extends over multiple volumes, the writing in the register necessarily differs from the writing on the book. For example, if Kitāb al-hidāya fī mujalladayn (Book of the Guidance in Two Volumes) is written in the register, the writing on each volume's front page is such that each of these differs from the one in the register. For example, in the first volume is written al-Mujallad al-awwal min kitāb al-hidāya (The First of the Two Volume[s] of the Book of the Guidance). In the second volume is written al-Mujallad al-thānī min kitāb al-hidāya (The Second of the Volume[s] of the Book of the Guidance) with the letters lam and alif (al-), which is for contextual determination because in the register the word mujallad (volume) is written; even though it is an indefinite noun, because of the phrase fī mujalladayn (in two volumes), the lam of the definite article signifies the aforementioned definite noun. If the noun is indefinite, the lam of definiteness occurring in the phrase fī mujalladin refers to that aforementioned [particular] indefinite noun. However, if the word mujallad is not written as a definite noun but rather as an indefinite noun in both the register and also in the book, as in Mujallad min kitāb al-hidāya (Volume from Book of the Guidance), this means that it is a single volume and its other related volumes do not exist. An exception: But sometimes it happens that rarely the word mujallad is written as a definite noun in both the register and also in the book. For example, as in al-Mujallad al-thānī (The Second of the Volume[s]), and also as in al-Mujallad al-akhir min al-hidāya (The Last of the Volume[s] of the Guidance). In these cases, the other related volumes have not been found.

And one other rule is this: that books in Arabic verse in all disciplines are to be included under Arabic divans, and books in Persian verse in all disciplines are to be included under Persian divans, and books in Turkish verse in all disciplines are to be included under Turkish divans; [these] are not included under prose [books]. An exception: But sometimes it happens that a versified book is highly esteemed among books belonging to its discipline, as though it is fundamental to its discipline. Then, books like this are included under prose books in corresponding disciplines, such as Qaṣīda-i Shāṭibī in the science of recitation. And let it be known that commentaries on qasidas and commentaries on books in verse are included under compositions in verse when their main intention is [to be] a book in verse. And when its commentary is a versified book, it is included under books in verse: “And each one hath a goal toward which he turneth,” Qur’an 2:148. And also let it be known that sometimes some of the copies of a book in rhyme are included under books in rhyme, and some copies are included under books in their own discipline, like Nathri [so in original] al-La‘ālī, most copies of which have been included under books in rhyme, and some copies of which have been included under books on advice because of the possibility of its being requested among books of advice. But such cases are extremely few and rare.

And one other rule is: that when each heading written on the front page or binding flap of a book was written in the register, above its beginning a linear mark (butta) has been placed in red ink, and at its end a triple zero is also written in red ink. But if a book extends over two volumes, what is written in the register differs from the writing in the book, yet it is not different in meaning. For example, in the register Kitāb al-hidāya fī mujalladayn (Book of the Guidance in two volumes) is written; at its beginning a red linear mark and at its end red zeros are placed. But the first volume of the book has al-Mujallad al-awwal min kitāb al-hidāya (The First Volume of Book of the Guidance), and in its second volume is written al-Mujallad al-thānī (The Second Volume), and so forth when there are yet more (multiple) volumes. End of the Rules of the Register.

The Rule of the Repository is that section headings enumerated in the register’s table of contents are written on top of each repository in exactly the same way. And for deluxe books in each section one place is assigned, and for non-deluxe books another place is assigned. On top of these [places] it is to be written whether they are a “deluxe depository” or “non-deluxe depository,” so that when the contents of each repository are taken outside under the sun, they do not mix with one another. Islamic books are to be treated respectfully in accordance with religious decorum.

APPENDIX V

TRANSLATION OF 'ATUFI'S ARABIC PREFACE TO THE PALACE LIBRARY INVENTORY

IN THE NAME OF GOD, THE MOST COMPASSIONATE, THE MOST MERCIFUL

Praise be to God, who maintains order among mankind through the justice of rulers • and directs the affair from above the heavens to underneath the earths¹ •

The One who made knowledge a pillar for religion • and [made] writing a pillar for knowledge and certitude. •

And blessings be upon him who combined the knowledge of those who went before and those who came later •—both the content of the earliest scrolls [of scripture] and the books of the [later] Messengers—:²

Muhammad, the Seal of all Prophets • and the paragon of all [God's] friends and [His] elect. •

And [blessings be] upon those who are the stars of Islam • from among his noble family and Companions. •

Now to the matter at hand:

The most knowledgeable Sultan • and the greatest Khan •

Just [ruler] of the time • and Mahdi of the age •

Sword of the two seas • and Lord of the two lands •

Chief of the Caesars • and bastion of the Khosroes •

Vanquisher of revolters • and subduer of transgressors •

Uprooter of heretics • and repeller of rebels •

Helper of virtuous paths • and queller of false ways •

Benefactor to the learned • and protector to the upright •

Paragon amongst those possessing sanctified souls • and supreme amongst those ruling over dominions of [divine] intimacy •

Sun of beauty • and sky of majesty •

Pole to the orbits of intellectual attainments • and zenith to the skies of practical virtues •

Sultan of all sultans • and qibla of all khaqans:

Sultan Bayezid Khan son of Mehemmed Khan son of Murad Khan son of Sultan Mehemmed Khan son of Yıldırım [Thunderbolt] Bayezid Khan son of Ghazi [Holy Warrior] Murad Khan son of Orhan son of Osman Khan—may God the Most High be pleased with them • and may God the Most High be gracious towards them. •

When he resolved to attend to the books of the religious sciences, he commanded one of his slaves to determine the titles of the books in his imperial treasury and to classify every book according to its particular discipline, writing [this information] on the front pages and the bindings, and [he commanded me] to write these in the [present] register in a way that corresponds to the titles and descriptions that are [written] on the front pages and the bindings—without altering [these] in any way [that is to say, any semantic way, not any literal way. For on rare occasions the text in one differs from the text in the other without changing the understood meaning. As for such differences, they concern either substitution, or addition and subtraction, or pre-position and] post-position].³ Therefore, this lowly slave [and he is the author of this register, not its transcriber]⁴ promptly embarked upon obeying [the sultan's] noble command • and finished what was commanded—by the help of God, the Great and the Exalted • in the year 908.

Author's note: The dots shown here correspond to the triple-dot marks on the original manuscript.

1. Cf. Q 32:5 and 65:12.
2. This bifurcation of revealed scriptures likely reflects a Prophetic hadith that attributes certain “scrolls” or “leaves” (presumably meaning minor writings) to ancient Prophets

(such as Seth, Enoch, and Abraham) while positing “books” for Moses, David, Jesus, and Muhammad. See Muḥammad Ibn Ḥibbān, al-Iḥsān fī taqrīb Ṣaḥīḥ Ibn Ḥibbān, tartīb ‘Alā’ al-Dīn al-Fārisī, ed. Shu‘ayb al-Arna’ūt (Beirut: Mu’assasat al-Risālah, 1988), 2:77 (no. 361). Several commentators map this division of revealed writings to the pair “al-zubur wa-l-kitāb al-munīr” that appears in Q. 3:184 and 35:25, and to the similar juxtaposition of kalimāt and kutub in Q. 66:12. See, e.g., al-Zamakhsharī’s discussion of these verses in his commentary, al-Kashshāf ‘an ḥaqā’iq ghawāmiḍ al-tanzīl.

3. This annotation appears as a superscript and continues in the margin.
4. The superscripted phrase is found beneath the phrase “lowly servant,” in what seems to be the same handwriting (though in a smaller size), presumably representing a later explanatory gloss.

PRINCIPLES OBSERVED IN TRANSLITERATING MS TÖRÖK F. 59

In the following, “text” refers to the manuscript that contains the library inventory; “transliterated text” refers to its transliteration.

The IJMES transliteration system for Arabic, Persian, and Ottoman Turkish was used, except where differences are noted below. Text in red has been bolded.

The orthography of the text is not replicated when it differs from standard Arabic orthography, e.g., medial hamza, written nearly consistently with either the letter yā’ (sāyil for sā’il) or wāw (aswila for as’ila), has been transliterated with a hamza without noting each occurrence. Likewise, dots under a yā’ for an alifmaqṣūra (e.g., ‘alā, fol. 11, l. 7), also a consistent orthographic habit, are not noted. The cataloguer most often vocalizes tarjuma, but it has been transliterated throughout as tarjama.

The shadda indicating assimilation of the lām of the definite article (ad-dīn, transliterated as al-dīn) is ignored, as is—here differing from the IJMES transliteration system—the hamzat al-waṣl of the definite article, so that al- is transliterated in full unless the alif is omitted in the text (li-llāh, li-l-Rāzī, but wa-al-kutub). Vowel lengthening in pronominal suffixes is not added in transliteration, thus bi-khaṭṭihi. Except for in the title Ḥujjat al-Islām, the tā’ marbūṭa is not vocalized without a case ending in proper names or epithets (‘Allāma).

Case endings (i’rāb) have been indicated throughout the transliteration, since they are (mostly) marked as such on the manuscript itself. Where case endings are not indicated in the text, they are added in the transliteration. When a case ending or a word is vocalized incorrectly in the text, it is corrected in the transliterated text. The standard convention of Arabists, according to which book titles are transliterated without inflection, has not been followed in the transliterated text.

Brackets in the transliteration indicate a marginal or other addition to the text noting an omission or containing an explanation by the scribe—these are not always referenced in a footnote to the transliterated text. Brackets have also been used to note when words completing the line in the text were added above the word(s) at the end of the line, rather than continuing on to the following line.

In the text there are words in red ink; these have been rendered in black bold characters. There are also red or black signs that mark the beginning and end of inventory entries as well as subsections. The “butta” signs above the beginning of each entry have been indicated by ~. When the “butta” is used to mark the beginning of different texts in multi-text compendiums, it is indicated by ~. The “butta” indicates a new entry and therefore the word following has been capitalized; only indefinite entries (e.g., risālatun fī) have not been capitalized. The triple dots at the end of entries and subsections have been reproduced with .

The scribe ‘Atufi indicates a title on loan to a reader with a marginal phrase in the text that begins with maṭlab and might be followed by the book title. These are given in brackets and italics (bolded if the phrase was in red ink) in the transliterated text.

Occasionally ‘Atufi will write a Persian title with Arabic conventions; if it is clear that the title is meant to be in Persian (e.g., when a hamza indicates an ezāfe or the proper name is missing the Arabic definite article), Persian transliteration has most often been used. The Persian gāf is always transcribed in the text with a kāf (very rarely with three dots to distinguish it) but it has been transliterated as a g.

Proper names and titles (e.g., Sulṭān al-Salāṭīn) are capitalized in transliteration and presented without case endings. Qur'ān, Tawrāt, and Injīl are also capitalized. When a proper name has been given in its adjectival form (e.g., al-islāmiyya; al-iskandariyya), these have not been capitalized. Only the first word of the book title is capitalized in transliteration; when defined, Kitāb, Risāla, Mukhtaṣar, Matn, and Sharḥ have been understood as the first element of the book title.

Ottoman Turkish books have been transliterated according to the Ottoman Turkish transliteration system unless the book title is in Arabic; the most common Turkish names and titles of individuals are generally written according to Ottoman spelling even if the manuscript has an Arabic transcription (e.g., Bāyezīd; Meḥammed; Çelebi).

Although the text in the beginning provides a catchword, these have not been transliterated.

4 For nayrinjāt, ‘Atufi has covered his bases here with both a fathḥa and a kasra under the nūn, nayranj and nīranj (< P nayrang) being correct Arabic transcriptions, but the kasra under the rā, which he has throughout, would seem to be incorrect; for ṭilismāt (ṭilasmāt), he is not completely consistent and most of the time does not provide vocalization.

²¹ After wāḥidin, the upper part of fī is written.

⁴⁶ The manuscript has what looks like a dagger alif above the rā', as in mir'āti, but it is likely a case of 'Atufi being indecisive about where to write the hamza: on the alif or on the line, both of which were common. It would seem that the reference is to a learned woman, i.e., Sitt al-'Ajam bt. al-Nafīs, who wrote this sharḥ on Ibn al-'Arabī.

¹³⁴ A fī was added between ta'yīn and al-marātib but it is out of place; it was perhaps meant to be the second fī (also added, after al-marātib) and just never erased.

137 The manuscript has a ḍamma above the rā', but if not Persian, the second word would have to be indefinite, which is not given.

138 The manuscript has a ḍamma above the tā' marbūṭa, but Fattāḥī, without a definite article, would not seem to be an Arab.
